Cuneate Leaf.

Cuneal (kū'nē-al), a. [L. cuneus, a wedge. See COIN.] Having the form of a wedge.

Cuneate, Cuneated (kū'nē-āt, kū'nē-āt-ed), a. Wedge-shaped; as, a cuneate leaf, that is, a leaf which terminates abruptly with a blunted point and tapers gradually downwards or towards the foot-stalk.

Cuneatic (kū-nē-at'ik), a. Cuneate (which see).

Cuneiform, Cuniform (kū-nē'i-form, kū'ni-form), a. [L. cuneus, a wedge, and forma, form.] 1. Having the shape or form of a wedge; specifically, the epithet applied to the inscriptions found on old Babylonian and Persian monuments, from the characters resembling a wedge. This style of writing was used for monumental records, and was either carved on rocks and sculptures or impressed on bricks. It appears to have been first used in Assyria and Media so far back as 2000 years before Christ, and to have thence spread over the whole portion of Asia which formed the vast Persian Empire. See ARROW-HEADED.—2. Versed in the wedge-shaped characters, or the inscriptions written in them. 'A cuneiform scholar.' Sir H. Rawlinson.—Cuneiform bones, in anat. the name given to three bones of the foot from their wedge-like shape, viz. the inner, middle, and outer cuneiform bones. They are situated at the fore-part of the tarsus and inner side of the cuboidal bone, and are fitted to each other like the stones of an arch.

Cunette (kų-net'), n. [Fr.] In fort. a deep trench sunk along the middle of a dry moat, to make the passage more difficult.

Cuniculate (kū-nik'ū-lāt), a. [L. cuniculus, a passage underground, a cavity.] In bot. traversed by a long passage open at one end, as the peduncle of Tropæolum.

Cuniculous (kū-nik'ū-lus), a. [L. cuniculus, a rabbit.] Relating to rabbits. [Rare.]

Cunner (kun'ner), n. See CONNER.

Cunning (kun'ing), a. [O.E. cunnand, from A.Sax. cunnan, Icel. kunna, Goth. kunnan, to know, to be skilful, from a root common to the Teutonic tongues, seen also in can, ken, know.] 1. Having skill or dexterity; having knowledge acquired by experience; skilful; experienced; well instructed. 'A cunning workman.' Ex. xxviii. 23. 'His statue graven by a cunning hand.' Macaulay. [Now antiquated or poetical.]

Esau was a cunning hunter. Gen. xxv. 27.
I will take away the cunning artificer. Is. iii. 3.

2. Wrought with skill; curious; ingenious.

All the more do I admire
Joints of cunning workmanship. Tennyson.

3. Artful; shrewd; sly; crafty; astute; designing; subtle; as, a cunning fellow.

Accounting his integrity to be but a cunning face of falsehood. Sir P. Sidney.

They are resolved to be cunning; let others run the hazard of being sincere. South.

—Cunning, Artful, Sly. Cunning, lit. knowing, formerly used as descriptive of skill, generally manual skill, now for the most part implies a mean turn of mind with no great amount of ability; artful indicates greater ingenuity and more invention; sly has the idea of double-dealing and concealment.

She guides the cunning artist's hand. Pope.
Artful in speech, in action, and in mind. Pope.
Envy works in a sly imperceptible manner. Watts.

Cunning (kun'ing), n. 1.† Knowledge; art; skill; dexterity.

Let my right hand forget her cunning. Ps. cxxxvii. 5.

2. Art; artifice; artfulness; craft; shrewdness; the faculty or act of using stratagem to accomplish a purpose; hence, in a bad sense, deceitfulness or deceit; fraudulent skill or dexterity.

Discourage cunning in a child; cunning is the ape of wisdom. Locke.

We take cunning for a sinister or crooked wisdom; and certainly there is great difference between a cunning man and a wise man, not only in point of honesty, but in point of ability. Bacon.

SYN. Art, artifice, craft, craftiness, shrewdness, subtlety, wile, ruse, guile, stratagem, finesse, duplicity.

Cunningaire, Cuningar, n. [Sw. kaninga-aard.] A warren for rabbits. [Scotch.]

Cunninghamia (kun-ing-ham'i-a), n. [In honour of two brothers, J. and A. Cunningham, Australian botanists.] A genus of coniferous plants having the appearance of an araucaria, but more closely related to the pine in the structure of its fruit. Only one species is known, C. sinensis, from Southern China. It has narrow, oval, lanceolate, stiff, pungent leaves.

Cunningly (kun'ing-li), adv. 1. Artfully; craftily; with subtlety; with fraudulent contrivance.

We have not followed cunningly devised fables. 2 Pet. i. 16.

2. Skilfully; artistically.

A stately palace built of squared bricke
Which cunningly was without mortar laid. Spenser.

Cunning-man (kun'ing-man), n. A man who pretends to tell fortunes, or teach how to recover stolen or lost goods.

Cunningness (kun'ing-nes), n. Cunning; craft; deceitfulness.

Cunning-woman (kun'ing-wųm-an), n. A female fortune-teller. See CUNNING-MAN.

Cunonia (kū-nō'ni-a), n. [In honour of J. C. Cuno, of Amsterdam.] A small genus of plants, nat. order Saxifragaceæ. One species is found in South Africa and five in New Caledonia. They are small trees or shrubs with compound leaves, and dense racemes of small white flowers. The bark is used for tanning purposes.

Cup (kup), n. [A. Sax. cuppe, cuppa, a cup, from L. cupa, a tub, a cask, in later times a drinking vessel, a cup, whence also Fr. coupe (which would no doubt be introduced into England and combine with O.E. or A. Sax. cuppe), It. coppa, Sp. copa, D. and Dan. kop, Sw. kopp.] 1. A vessel of small capacity, used commonly to drink from; a chalice.

Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth his colour in the cup. Prov. xxiii. 31.

2. The contents of a cup; the liquor contained in a cup, or that it may contain; as, a cup of beer.

'Tis a little thing
To give a cup of water; yet its draught
May give a shock of pleasure to the frame
More exquisite than when Nectarean juice
Renews the life of joy in happiest hours. Talfourd.

3. That which is to be received or endured; that which falls to one's lot, whether good or evil; portion.

O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me. Mat. xxvi. 39.

4. Anything formed like a cup; as, the cup of an acorn, of a flower, and the like.

The cowslip's golden cup no more I see. Shenstone.

5. A cupping-glass (which see).—6. pl. Social entertainment; a drinking-bout. 'Thence from cups to civil broils.' Milton.—Cup and can, familiar companions; the can being the large vessel out of which the cup is filled, and thus the two being constantly associated.—In his cups, intoxicated; tipsy.—Many a slip between the cup and the lip, a proverb suggesting that many accidents intervene to prevent the realization of hopes and intentions.

Cup (kup), v.i. pret. & pp. cupped; ppr. cupping. In surg. to perform the operation of cupping.

Cup (kup), v.t. 1. To supply with cups, as of liquor. 'Plumpy Bacchus, . . . cup us till the world go round.' Shak.—2. To bleed by means of cupping-glasses; to perform the operation of cupping upon.

Him the damn'd doctors and his friends immur'd;
They bled, they cupp'd, they purg'd; in short, they cur'd. Pope.

Cup-and-saucer Limpet, n. The popular name of shells of the genus Calyptræa, so called from their limpet-like shell having a half-cup-like process in the interior.

Cup-bearer (kup'bär-ėr), n. 1. An attendant at a feast who conveys wine or other liquors to the guests.—2. In antiq. an officer of the household of a prince or noble, who tasted the wine before handing it to his master.

Cupboard (kub'bêrd), n. Originally, a board or shelf for cups to stand on: now, a small case or inclosure in a room with shelves to receive cups, plates, dishes, and the like.

Cupboard† (kub'bêrd), v.t. To collect, as into a cupboard; to hoard.

> Only like a gulf it (the belly) did remain
> I' the midst o' the body, idle and unactive,
> Still cupboarding the viand. Shak.

Cupel (kū'pel), n. [L. cupella, dim. of cupa, a tub.] A small shallow, porous, cup-like vessel used in refining metals. It retains them while in a metallic state, but when changed by fire into a fluid scoria it absorbs the coarser metals. Thus, when a mixture of lead with gold or silver is heated in a strong fire the lead is oxidated and vitrified, and sinks into the substance of the cupel, while the gold or silver remains pure. This kind of vessel is made usually of phosphate of lime or the residue of burned bones rammed into a mould, which gives it its figure.

Cupel-dust (kū'pel-dust), n. Powder used in purifying metals.

Cupellation (kū-pel-lā'shon), n. The refining of gold or silver by a cupel or by scorification.

Cupful (kup'fụl), n. As much as a cup holds.

Cup-gall (kup'gal), n. A singular kind of gall found on the leaves of the oak and some other trees, of the figure of a cup, or drinking-glass without its foot, adhering by its point or apex to the leaf, and containing the larva of a small fly.

Cupid, Townley Marbles, British Museum.

Cupid (kū'pid), n. [L. Cupido, from cupido, desire, from cupio, to desire.] The Roman name of the Grecian god of love Eros, the son of Hermes (Mercury) and Aphroditê (Venus). He is generally represented as a beautiful child with wings, blind, and carrying a bow and quiver of arrows, with which he transpierced the hearts of lovers, inflaming them with desire.

Cupidity (kū-pid'i-ti), n. [L. cupiditas, from cupidus, from cupio, to desire, to covet.] An eager desire to possess something; an ardent wishing or longing; inordinate or unlawful desire, especially of wealth or power.

> No property is secure when it becomes large enough to tempt the cupidity of indigent power. Burke.

SYN. Avarice, covetousness, greed, greediness, desire.

Cup-moss (kup'mos), n. The common name of a lichen, Scyphophorus pyxidatus, so called from the cup-like shape of its erect frond.

Cupola (kū'pō-la), n. [It. cupola, dim. of L. cupa, a cup. See CUP.] 1. In arch. a spherical vault on the top of an edifice; a dome, or the round top of a dome. The Italian word signifies a hemispherical roof which covers a circular building, like the Pantheon at Rome or the temple of Vesta at Tivoli. The greater part of modern cupolas are semi-elliptical, cut through their shortest diameter, and constructed of timber; but the ancient cupolas were nearly hemispherical, and constructed of stone. 2. The round top of any structure, as of a furnace; the furnace itself.—3. In anat. the dome-like extremity of the canal of the cochlea.

Cupola, Radclyffe Library, Oxford.

Cupolaed† (kū'pō-lad), a. Having a cupola.

Cupola-furnace (kū'pō-la-fėr-nās), n. A furnace for melting iron, so called from the cupola or dome leading to the chimney, which is now, however, frequently omitted.

Cuppa (kup'pa), n. In her. one of the furs composed of any metal and colour. Called also Potent Counter-potent.

Cupper (kup'ėr), n. One who applies a cupping-glass; a scarifier.

Cupping (kup'ing), n. In surg. the application of the cupping-glass. There are two kinds of cupping; one in which the part is scarified and some blood taken away, generally simply termed cupping; the other where there is no scarification and no blood is abstracted, which is accordingly termed dry-cupping, the object of the cupping being either to excite action in the part or to abstract pus.

Cupping-glass (kup'ing-glas), n. A glass vessel like a cup, to be applied to the skin in the operation of cupping. The cupping-glass is first held over the flame of a spirit lamp, by which means the included air is rarefied. In this state it is applied to the skin, and as the heated air cools, it contracts and produces a partial vacuum, so that the skin and integuments are drawn up into the glass and become swollen. In some forms of cupping-glasses the air is exhausted by a syringe.

Cupreous (kū'prē-us), a. [L. cupreus, from cuprum, copper.] Coppery; consisting of copper; resembling copper or partaking of its qualities.

Cupressinæ (kū-pres-sī'nē), n. pl. The cypress tribe, a sub-order of dicotyledonous plants, nat. order Coniferæ, of which the genus Cupressus is the type. See CUPRESSUS.

Cupressite (kū-pres'īt), n. A name given to coniferous fossil plants occurring in the trias, lias, oolite, and Wealden, which are supposed to be allied to the existing cypress.

Cupressus (kū-pres'us), n. The cypress, a genus of coniferous plants, having small, scale-like, adpressed or spreading acute leaves, as in the junipers, and cones formed of a small number of peltate woody scales, with the seeds very small, angular, and several to each bract. The common cypress is C. sempervirens, a native of the East. The tree, with erect adpressed branches, having a slender pyramidal form, so frequently planted in Mohammedan burying grounds, is a variety of this species. Several species have been introduced from India, China, and California into our shrubberies. See CYPRESS.

Cupric, Cuprous (kū'prik, kū'prus), a. Of or belonging to copper; as, cupric or cuprous acid.

Cupriferous (kū-prif'ėr-us), a. [L. cuprum, copper, and fero, to bear.] Producing or affording copper; as, cupriferous silver.

Cuprite (kū'prīt), n. The red oxide of copper; red copper ore.

Cuproid (kū'proid), a. [L. cuprum, copper, and Gr. eidos, resemblance.] In crystal. a solid related to a tetrahedron, and contained under twelve equal triangles.

Cuproplumbite (kū-prō-plum'bīt), n. A sulphide of copper and lead from Chili, occurring in forms of the regular system, with cubic cleavage. It contains a small percentage of silver.

Cup-rose (kup'rōz), n. The poppy.

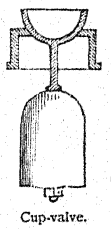
Cupula, Cupule (kū'pū-la, kū'pūl), n. [See CUPOLA, CUP.] In bot. a form of involucrum, occurring in the oak, the beech, and the hazel, and consisting of bracts, not much developed, till after flowering, when they cohere by their bases, and form a kind of cup.

Cupuliferæ (kū-pū-lif'ė-rē), n. pl. [L. cupula, and fero, to bear.] The oak family, so named from the peculiar husk or cup (cupule) in which the fruit is inclosed: a nat. order of apetalous dicotyledonous plants, with monœcious flowers, the sterile flowers being in catkins, and the fertile solitary, two or three together or in clusters, furnished with an involucre which incloses the fruit or forms the cupule at its base. They are trees or shrubs, inhabiting chiefly the temperate parts of the northern hemisphere. They are common in Europe, Asia, and North America. This order furnishes many trees, which are highly valued on account of their timber. The chief genera are Quercus or oak, Castanea or chestnut, Fagus or beech, and Corylus or hazel. The astringent bark of the oak abounds in tannin, gallic acid, and quercine, and is used in tanning and dyeing. Galls are swellings on the leaf-stalks, &c., of oaks when wounded by insects. Cork is the outer layer of the bark of the Spanish oak. See OAK.



Cup-valve.

Cupuliferous (kū-pū-lif'ėr-us), a. In bot. bearing cupules.

Cup-valve (kup'valv), n. A valve, the seat of which is made to fit a cover in the form of a vase, or of the portion of a sphere.

Cur (kėr), n. [From root of Icel. kurra, to grumble or mutter. Cog. D. korre, a small dog. Others regard the word as an abbreviation of curtail, a dog whose tail was cut off to disqualify it for the chase.] 1. A degenerate dog.

> They, . . . like to village curs,
> Bark when their fellows do. Shak.

2. A worthless man: in contempt.

> Your judgments, my grave lords,
> Must give this cur the lie. Shak.

Curability (kūr-a-bil'i-ti), n. Quality of being curable.

Curable (kūr'a-bl), a. [See CURE.] That may be healed or cured; admitting a remedy; as, a curable wound or disease; a curable evil.

Curableness (kūr'a-bl-nes), n. Possibility of being cured, healed, or remedied.

Curaçoa (kö-ra-sō'), n. A liqueur or cordial flavoured with orange-peel, cinnamon, and mace: so named from the island of Curaçoa, where it was first made.

Curacy, Curateship (kū'ra-si, kū'rāt-ship), n. [See CURE and CURATE.] The office or employment of a curate; the employment of a clergyman who represents the incumbent or beneficiary of a church, parson, or vicar, and officiates in his stead.

Curari, Curara (kụ'ra-rē, kụ'ra-rä), n. A brown-black, shining, brittle, resinous substance, consisting of the aqueous extract of Strychnos toxifera, used by the South American Indians for poisoning their arrows, especially the small arrows shot from the blow-pipe. Curari may, except in very large doses, be introduced with impunity into the alimentary canal, but if introduced into a puncture of the skin so as to mix with the blood, the effects are very soon fatal. It acts chiefly on the motor nerves, and causes death by paralysis of the nerves of the respiratory organs. The great use of curari is for the chase, the animals killed by it being quite wholesome. It is variously written Ourari, Urari, Woorara, Woorali, Wourali.

Curarine (kū'ra-rin), n. An alkaloid extracted from curari, forming a yellowish amorphous bitter mass, more poisonous than the curari which yields it, 0·05 gramme introduced into the skin of a rabbit killing it in a short time.

Curassow (kū-ras'sō), n. The name given to birds of the genus Crax, natives of the warm parts of America. The crested curassow is the Crax alector, a native of Guiana, Mexico, and Brazil; the red curassow is the Crax rubra, about the size of a turkey, an inhabitant of South America. The cushew-bird (Urax pauxi) is called the galeated curassow. See CRACIDÆ, CRAX.

Crested Curassow (Crax alector).

Curat,† Curiet,† n. A cuirass. Spenser.

Curate (kū'rāt), n. [L.L. curatus, one intrusted with the cure of souls, from L. cura, care.] Lit. one who has the cure of souls, in which sense it is used in the Church of England prayer-book, 'all bishops and curates;' specifically, a clergyman in Episcopal churches, who is employed to perform divine service in the place of the incumbent, parson, or vicar. He must be licensed by the bishop or ordinary. In the Church of England there are two kinds of curates, stipendiary and perpetual. A stipendiary curate is one who is hired by the rector or vicar to serve for him, and may be removed at pleasure; a perpetual curate is one who is not dependent on the rector, but is supported by a part of the tithes or otherwise.

Curative (kū'ra-tiv), a. Relating to the cure of diseases; tending to cure.

Curator (kū-rāt'ėr), n. [L., from curo, curatum, to take care of, from cura, care.] 1. One who has the care and superintendence of anything, as a university, public library, museum, fine art collection, or the like.

> Seeing the above-mentioned strangers are like to continue here yet awhile, at the least some of them, the society shall much stand in need of a curator of experiments. Boyle.
> (By the Universities Act of 1858) the patronage of the chairs (of the University of Edinburgh) was transferred to seven curators, three of whom are nominated by the university court and four by the town council. Chambers's Ency.

2. In Scots law, a guardian; one appointed to administer the estate of any person who is not legally competent to manage his property, as a minor who has attained the age of fourteen, or a lunatic.

Curatorship (kū-rāt'ėr-ship), n. The office of a curator.

Curatrix (kū-rāt'riks), n. 1. She that cures or heals. — 2. A female superintendent or guardian. Richardson.

Curb (kėrb), v.t. [From Fr. courber, to bend or crook, from L. curvare, to bend or curve, from curvus, crooked, curved; same root as L. circus, a circle, Gr. kurtos, crooked.] 1.† To bend or curve. 'Crooked and curbed lines.' Holland. —2. To bend to one's will; to check; to restrain; to hold back; to confine; to keep in subjection; as, to curb the passions. 'And wisely learn to curb thy sorrows wild.' Milton.

> So is the will of a living daughter curbed by the will of a dead father. Shak.
> Curb then, O youth! these raptures as they rise. Crabbe.

3. To restrain with a curb; to guide and manage by the reins.

> Part curb their fiery steeds. Milton.

4. To strengthen or defend by a curb; as, to curb a well or a bank of earth.

Curb† (kėrb), v.i. To bend; to truckle. [Rare.]

> Virtue itself of vice must pardon beg,
> Yea, curb and woo, for leave to do him good. Shak.

Curb (kėrb), n. 1. What checks, restrains, or holds back; restraint; check; hinderance; as, public opinion is to many a curb upon licentiousness.

> Wild natures need wise curbs. Tennyson.

2. A chain or strap attached to the branches of the bit of a bridle, and passing under the horse's lower jaw, against which it is made to press tightly when the rein is pulled.

> He that before ran in the pastures wild
> Felt the stiff curb control his angry jaws. Drayton.

3. The edge-stone of a side walk or pavement; a curb-stone. — 4. A breast-wall or retaining wall to support a bank of earth. The word is used also with various other technical meanings; as, a casing of stone, wood, brick, or iron inside a well that is being sunk; a boarded structure to contain concrete; the wall-plate at the springing of a dome.

Curb (kėrb), n. [Fr. courbe, It. corba, from L. corbis, a basket, from form of swelling.] The general term for a hard and callous swelling on various parts of a horse's leg, as the hinder part of the hock, the inside of the hoof, beneath the elbow of the hoof, &c.

Curba (kėr'ba), n. An African measure of capacity, varying at different places from 7½ to 18 gallons, used by the negroes in the sale of palm-oil, grain, pulse, &c. It may be either a tub, a basket, or an earthen pot.

Curbable (kėrb'a-bl), a. Capable of being curbed or restrained. [Rare.]

Curbless (kėrb'les), a. Having no curb or restraint.

Curb-plate (kėrb'plāt), n. A circular, continued plate, designed to support or restrain some part, as the wall-plate of a circularly or elliptically ribbed dome, the horizontal rib on the top of such a dome, in which the vertical ribs terminate; the plate of a skylight; the plate in a curb-roof which receives the feet of the upper rafters; the circular frame round a well.

Curb-roof (kėrb'röf), n. [Fr. courber, to bend.] In arch. a roof in which the rafters, instead of continuing straight down from the ridge to the walls, are at a given height received on plates, which in their turn are supported by rafters less inclined to the horizon, whose bearing is directly on the walls, so that this kind of roof presents a bent appearance, whence its name. Called also a Mansard Roof, from the name of its inventor.

Curb-roof.

Curb-sender (kėrb'send-ėr), n. An automatic signalling apparatus invented by Sir W. Thomson of Glasgow (Lord Kelvin) and Prof. Fleeming Jenkin, and used in submarine telegraphy. The message is punched on a paper-ribbon, which is then passed through the transmitting apparatus by clock-work. The name is due to the fact that when a current of one kind of electricity is sent by the instrument another of the opposite kind is sent immediately after to curb the first, the effect of the second transmission being to make the indication produced by the first sharp and distinct, instead of slow and uncertain.

Curb-stone (kėrb'stōn), n. A stone placed against earth or stonework to hold the work together; the outer edge of a foot pavement.

Curcas (kėr'kas), n. A genus of euphorbiaceous plants, containing a single species, Curcas purgans (the physic-nut), the seeds and oil of which are used in medicine. It is indigenous to tropical America, but is cultivated in all tropical countries.

To utter a wish of evil against one; to imprecate evil upon; to call for mischief or injury to fall upon; to execrate.

Thou shalt not curse the ruler of thy people.
Ex. xxii. 28.
Curse me this people, for they are too mighty for me.
Num. xxii. 6.

Hence—2. To bring a curse on by wishing or imprecating evil to or upon; to blast; to blight.

Sure some fell fiend has cursed our line,
That coward should be son of mine. Sir W. Scott.

3. To injure; to subject to evil; to vex, harass, or torment with great calamities.

On impious realms and barbarous kings impose
Thy plagues, and curse 'em with such sons as those.
Pope.

Curse (kėrs), v.i. To utter imprecations; to affirm or deny with imprecations of divine vengeance; to use blasphemous or profane language; to swear.

Then began he to curse and to swear. Mat. xxvi. 74.

Curse (kėrs), n. 1. Malediction; the expression of a wish of evil to another; imprecation of evil.

Shimei . . . who cursed me with a grievous curse.
1 Ki. ii. 8.
They entered into a curse, and into an oath.
Neh. x. 29.

2. Evil solemnly or in passion invoked upon one.

The priest shall write all these curses in a book.
Num. v 23.

3. That which brings evil or severe affliction; torment; great vexation. 'The common curse of mankind, folly and ignorance.' Shak.

I will make this city a curse to all nations. Jer. xxvi. 6.

4. Condemnation; sentence of divine vengeance on sinners.

Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law.
Gal. iii. 13.

—Curse of Scotland, in card-playing, the nine of diamonds. Various hypotheses have been set up as to the origin of this phrase; as, that it was the card on which the 'Butcher Duke' wrote a cruel order after Culloden; but the phrase was in use before; that it is a corruption of cross of Scotland, the nine diamonds being arranged somewhat like a St. Andrew's cross; that, in the game of Pope Joan, the nine of diamonds is the Pope, of whom the Scotch have an especial horror; that a cross of lozenges, like the nine of diamonds, formed the arms of Colonel Parker, who commanded with great severity in Scotland, after the death of Charles I.; also (and this is most probably the true explanation), that it represented the heraldic bearings of the Earl of Stair, who was detested for his share in the massacre of Glencoe.—SYN. Malediction, execration, ban, anathema, excommunication, affliction, torment.

Curse (kėrs), n. [A form of O.E. kerse, a cress, A. Sax. cerse. 'Wisdom and wit now is not worth a kerse.' Piers Plowman.] A cress: a word used only in such phrases as 'not to care a curse'; 'not worth a curse'. Needless to say that the meaning commonly attached to the word is coarser.

Cursed (kėrs'ed), p. and a. 1. Execrated; afflicted; vexed; tormented; blasted by a curse.

Let us fly this cursed place. Milton.

2. Deserving a curse; execrable; hateful; detestable; abominable; wicked. 'Cursed thoughts.' Shak.—3. Vexatious; troublesome. 'This cursed quarrel.' Dryden. 'Wounding thorns and cursed thistles.' Prior.

Cursedly (kėrs'ed-li), adv. In a cursed manner; enormously; miserably; in a manner to be cursed or detested.

Cursedness (kėrs'ed-nes), n. 1. The state of being under a curse, or of being doomed to execration or to evil.—2.† Blasphemous, profane, or evil speech; cursing.

His mouth is full of cursedness,
Of fraud, deceit, and guile.
Old metrical version of Psalms.

Curser (kėrs'ėr), n. One who curses or utters a curse.

Curship† (kėr'ship), n. [See CUR.] A ludicrous title of address (on type of lordship, worship), as indicating the currish, snarling, or mean disposition of the person addressed.

How durst th', I say, oppose thy curship
'Gainst arms, authority, and worship? Hudibras.

Cursing (kėrs'ing), n. Execration; the uttering of a curse; a dooming to vexation or misery.

God in cursing gives us better gifts
Than men in blessing. E. B. Browning.

Cursitor (kėr'si-tėr), n. [From the L. curso, cursito, to run.] 1. In England, a clerk in the Court of Chancery, whose business was to make out original writs. The office was abolished by 5 and 6 Wm. IV. lxxxii. The office of cursitor baron, who administered oaths to sheriffs, bailiffs, functionaries of the customs, &c., was abolished by 19 and 20 Vict. lxxxvi.—2.† A courier or runner. 'Cursitors to and fro.' Holland.

Cursive (kėr'siv), a. [It. corsivo, running. See COURSE and CURRENT.] Running; flowing.—Cursive hand, in writing, a running hand.

Cursively (kėr'siv-li), adv. In a running manner; fluently.

Cursor (kėr'sėr), n. [L., a runner.] Any part of a mathematical instrument that slides backward and forward upon another part, as the piece in an equinoctial ring-dial that slides to the day of the month, or the point that slides along a beam-compass, &c.

Cursorary† (kėr'sō-ra-ri), a. Cursory; hasty; running rapidly over. 'With a cursorary eye.' Shak. [A doubtful reading.]

Cursores (kėr-sō'rēz), n. pl. [L., runners.] 1. The runners, an order of birds (corresponding to the family Struthionidæ of most ornithologists, the order Ratitæ of others), so named from their remarkable velocity in running. The wings are but little developed, and are totally incapable of raising the birds from the ground, and the breast-bone is flat and not keeled as in other birds. Hence the name Ratitæ (L. ratis, a raft). The utmost that the wings can accomplish is to assist the powerful run, which is effected by the strong and highly developed legs. The order comprises the ostrich, the cassowary, the emu, rhea, and the apteryx. 2. A name given to those spiders which make no webs, but catch their prey by swift pursuit, such as the wolf-spider (Lycosa).

Cursorial (kėr-sō'ri-al), a. 1. Adapted for running; as, the legs of a dog are cursorial. 2. Of or pertaining to the Cursores; as, the cursorial order of birds.

Cursorily (kėr'sō-ri-li), adv. [See CURSORY.] In a running or hasty manner; slightly; hastily; without attention; as, I read the paper cursorily.

Cursoriness (kėr'sō-ri-nes), n. Slight view or attention.

Cursorius (kėr-sō'ri-us), n. A genus of grallatorial birds, forming the sub-family Cursorinæ of some naturalists, belonging to the plover tribe, including those birds which, from the limited development of their wings, are unable to fly, but which from the size and strength of their legs possess superior powers of running. The bill is long, as also the legs; and the mandibles are arched and compressed towards their extremities. To this genus belong the black-bellied courier, the brazen-winged courser, and the cream-coloured courser or swift-foot. These birds chiefly inhabit Africa.

Brazen-winged Courser (C. chalcopterus).

Cursory (kėr'sō-ri), a. [L. cursorius, from cursus. See COURSE.] 1. Running; hasty; slight; superficial; careless; not exercising close attention; as, a cursory reader; a cursory view.

The regard I have ever borne in my mind towards men of eminence . . . led me at my leisure to make cursory collections out of my books of their lives and actions. Strype.

Truth or reality is not that which lies on the surface of things and can be perceived by every cursory observer. Dr. Caird.

2.† Running about; not stationary. 'Their cursory men.' Proceedings against Garnet. SYN. Hasty, superficial, slight, careless, desultory, inattentive.

Curst (kėrst), a. [Probably from curse. Wedgwood refers it to the O.E. crus, wrathful, and connects it with Fr. courroux, wrath.] Froward; peevish; snarling; ill-tempered; crusty.

They are never curst but when they are hungry. Shak.

Though his mind
Be ne'er so curst, his tongue is kind. Crashaw.

Curstful† (kėrst'fųl), a. Crusty; peevish; ill-natured.

Curstly (kėrst'li), adv. Crustily; maliciously.

With hate the wise, with scorne the saints,
Evermore are curstly crost. Sylvester, Du Bartas.

Curt. Contraction for current, used in correspondence, &c., to signify the present month.

Curt (kėrt), a. [L. curtus.] 1. Short; concise.

In Homer we find not a few of these sagacious curt sentences, into which men unaccustomed with books are fond of compressing their experience of human life. Prof. Blackie.

2. Short and dry; tart.

'I know what you are going to say,' observed the gentleman in a curt, gruffish voice. Disraeli.

Curtail (kėr-tāl'), v.t. [Fr. court, short, and tailler, to cut.] To cut off the end or a part of; to dock; as, to curtail words; hence, in a more general sense, to shorten in any manner; to abridge; to diminish: sometimes followed by of, in which case there is a remote object to the verb.

Then why should we ourselves abridge,
And curtail our own privilege? Hudibras.

I that am curtailed of all fair proportion,
Deformed, unfinished. Shak.

Curtail, Curtail-dog (kėr'tāl, kėr'tāl-dog), n. [O.Fr. courtault, courtaut—Fr. court, short, and modified termination ard, as in das*tard*, drunk*ard*.] 1. A dog whose tail is cut off, according to the forest laws, its owner being hindered from coursing.—2. In later usage, a common dog not meant for sport; a dog that has missed his game.

Hope is a curtail-dog in some affairs. Shak.

Curtailer (kėr-tāl'ėr), n. One who curtails; one who cuts off or shortens anything.

Curtailment (kėr-tāl'ment), n. A cutting off; a shortening; a diminution; retrenchment; as, the people demand a curtailment of the expenditure.

Curtail-step (kėr'tāl-step), n. The first or bottom step of a stair, when it is finished at its outer end, or end farthest from the wall, in the form of a scroll.

Curtain (kėr'tin), n. [Fr. courtine; It. cortina; L.L. cortina, a little court; L. cortina, a circle, as of a theatre, from cors, cortis, a court. See COURT. Comp. L. aulæum, a curtain, from aula, a hall or court.] 1. A hanging cloth or screen which may be contracted or expanded at pleasure so as to admit or exclude the light, conceal or discover anything, as a cloth hanging round a bed or before a window; the movable screen in a theatre or like place serving to conceal the stage from the spectators.—2. In fort. that part of a rampart which is between the flanks of two bastions, or between two gates, bordered with a parapet, behind which the soldiers stand to fire on the covered way, and into the moat. See BASTION for both definition and cut.—3. In Scrip. a tent; a habitation. Hab. iii. 7.—To drop the curtain, to close the scene, to end; the curtain falls, the play comes to an end; the scene closes; to raise the curtain, the curtain rises, to open the play or scene, the play or scene opens.

Truly and beautifully has Scott said of Swift, 'the stage darkened ere the curtain fell.' Chambers's Ency. of Lit.

—To draw the curtain, to conceal an object; to refrain from exhibiting, describing, or descanting on; as, we draw the curtain over his failings.—Behind the curtain, in concealment; in secret.

Curtain (kėr'tin), v.t. To inclose with, or as with, curtains; to furnish with curtains.

Whose eyelids curtained up their jewels dim. Keats.

Curtain-lecture (kėr'tin-lek-tūr), n. A lecture or reproof given behind the curtains or in bed by a wife to her husband.

What endless brawls by wives are bred!

Curtal (kėr'tāl), n. A horse or dog with a docked tail.

I'd give bay curtal and his furniture,
My mouth no more were broken than these boys'. Shak.

Curtal (kėr'tāl), a. Short; abridged; brief.

Curtal-ax (kėr'tal-aks), n. Same as Curtlax.

Curtal-friar (kėr'tal-frī-ėr), n. [For curtil-friar—curtilage, a court-yard, and friar.] The brother who acted as porter at the court-gate of a monastery.

Who hath seen our chaplain? Where is our curtal-friar? Sir W. Scott.

Curtail-dog (kėrt'al-dog), n. Same as Curtail, n.

Curtate (kėrt'āt), a. [L. curtatus, from curto, to shorten.] Shortened; reduced.—Curtate distance (of a planet), in astron. the distance between the sun or earth and that point where a perpendicular let fall from the planet meets the plane of the ecliptic.

Curtation (kėrt-ā'shon), n. [See CURTATE.] In astron. the difference between a planet's true distance from the sun and the curtate distance.

Curtein, Curtana (kėr-tān', kėr-tā'na), n. [From being apparently curtailed.] The pointless sword, carried before the kings of England at their coronation, and emblematically considered as the sword of mercy. It is also called the sword of Edward the Confessor.

Curteis,† a. [Fr.] Courteous. Chaucer.

Curtelasse† (kėr'tel-as), n. Same as Curtlax.

Curtesy (kėrt'e-si), n. Same as Curtsy (which see).

Curtilage (kėr'til-āj), n. [O.Fr. courtilage, from courtil, a court-yard, from L. cors, cortis, a court.] In law, a court-yard, backside, or piece of ground, lying near and belonging to a dwelling-house; the limit of the premises within which housebreaking can be committed.

Curtlax, Curtleax (kėr'tl-aks), n. [See CUTLASS.] One of the forms given to the French coutelas, properly signifying a short crooked sword; but acquiring in England some reference to a short axe, as if curtal axe.

Curtly (kėrt'li), adv. In a curt manner.

Curtness (kėrt'nes), n. Shortness; conciseness; tartness, as of manner.

Curtsy (kėrt'si), n. [Wedgwood thinks that this word is not simply a modification of courtesy, but that it comes through Prov. E. curchy, curch, crutch, a curtsy, from L. crux, a cross, the fundamental meaning being to put one's self into the reverent attitude of one who makes the sign of the cross. The Italian phrase, far croce, to cross the arms on the breast, often joined with bowing or kneeling, supports this.] A courtesy or gesture of respect by a female. See COURTESY.

Curtsy (kėrt'si), v.i. pret. & pp. curtsied; ppr. curtsying. To drop or make a curtsy.

The bird of paradise curtsied, as if she shrunk under the overwhelming greeting. Disraeli.

Curucui, n. The native name of a Brazilian bird of the woodpecker kind, Trogon Curucui. It is about 10½ inches in length, of very solitary habits, being found only in the deepest forests, and has its name from the melancholy note the male utters at pairing time. See TROGON.

Curule (kū'rōl), a. [L. curulis, pertaining to a chariot, belonging to the Roman chair of state, usually derived from currus, a chariot.

Curule Chair, from drawing found in Pompeii.

Pott suggests its connection with currus, crooked.] 1. Belonging to a chariot.—2. Privileged to sit in a curule chair; as, the curule magistrates.—Curule chair or seat, among the Romans, a sort of raised embellished chair or seat of ivory, gold, &c., placed in a chariot, wherein the chief officers of Rome were wont to be carried into council. It was also a mark of distinction for dictators, consuls, prætors, censors, and ediles, who were from this circumstance called curule magistrates. Curule chairs were of various shapes, but the one generally used was a stool without a back, so made as to be folded up and opened again in the manner of a camp-stool.

Cururlet (ku-rėr'let), n. A sort of plover. Crabb.

Curvant, Curval (kėrv'ant, kėrv'al), a. In her. curved or bowed.

Curvate, Curvated (kėrv'āt, kėrv'āt-ed), a. [See CURVE.] Curved; bent in a regular form.

Curvation (kėrv-ā'shon), n. The act of bending or curving.

Curvative (kėrv'a-tiv), a. In bot. having leaves whose margins are slightly turned up or down without any sensible bending inwards.

Curvature (kėrv'a-tūr), n. [L. curvatura. See CURVE.] A bending in a regular form; the continual bending of a line from a rectilineal direction. The curvature of a line is the peculiar manner of its bending or flexure, by which it becomes a curve of such and such peculiar properties. Thus the curvature of a circle is such, that every point in the circumference is equally distant from a point within called the centre, and so the curvature of the same circle is everywhere the same; but the curvature in all other curves is continually varying.—Circle of curvature, or circle of the same curvature, a circle which touches a curve in a point, so that no other circle touching it in the same point can pass between it and the curve.—Radius of curvature, the radius of the circle of curvature.—Double curvature, a term applied to the curvature of a line which twists, so that all the parts of it do not lie in the same plane, as the rhomb line or the loxodromic curve.

Curve (kėrv), a. [L. curvus, crooked, whence curvo, to bend. See CURB.] Bending; crooked; inflected in a regular form and without angles; as, a curve line, which may be cut by a straight line in more points than one.

> A curve line is that which is neither a straight line nor composed of straight lines. N. Webster.

Curve (kėrv), n. 1. A bending in a regular form and without angles; that which is bent without angles; a flexure.—2. In geom. a line which may be cut by a right line in more points than one; a line which changes its direction at every point; a line in which no three consecutive points lie in the same direction. The doctrine of curves and of the figures and solids generated from them constitutes what is called the higher geometry, and forms one of the most interesting and important branches of mathematical science. Curve lines are distinguished into algebraical or geometrical, and transcendental or mechanical. The varieties of curves are innumerable; that is, they have different degrees of bending or curvature. The curves most generally referred to, besides the circle, are the ellipse, the parabola, and the hyperbola, to which may be added the cycloid.—Algebraic curves, those in which the relation between the abscissa and the ordinate is expressed by an algebraic equation, called the equation of the curve.—Transcendental curves, those in which the relation between the abscissa and the ordinate is not expressed by an algebraic, but by a differential equation.—Algebraic curves of the first order, those of which the equation consists of two dimensions, as the circle, ellipse, parabola, and hyperbola.—Algebraic curves of the second order, those whose equation rises to the third degree, and so on. Curves are said to be of the same species, in which the motion of the describing point is regulated by the same mathematical law.—Mechanical curves are such as do not admit of being expressed analytically, and which have no known equation.—Anticlinal and synclinal curves, in geol. terms applied to the elevations and depressions of undulating surfaces of strata. See ANTICLINAL and SYNCLINAL.

Curve (kėrv), v.t. pret. & pp. curved; ppr. curving. [See the adjective.] To bend; to crook; to inflect. 'The tongue is drawn back or curved.' Holder.

Curve (kėrv), v.i. To have a curved or bent form; as, to curve inwards.

> Out again I curve and flow. Tennyson.

Curved (kėrvd), pp. or a. Bent; regularly inflected; formed into a curve.—SYN. Crooked, incurvated, awry.

Curvedness (kėrv'ed-nes), n. The state of being curved. [Rare.]

Curvembryeæ (kėrv-em-brī'ē-ē), n. pl. [Curve and embryo.] In bot. plants having a curved embryo.

Curvet (kėr-vet'), n. [It. corvetta; Fr. courbette. See CURVE.] 1. In the manége, a particular leap of a horse when he raises both his fore-legs at once, equally advanced, and as his fore-legs are falling he raises his hind-legs, so that all his legs are raised at once.—2. A prank; a frolic. Johnson.

Curvet (kėr-vet'), v.i. [It. corvettare; Fr. courbetter.] 1. To leap; to bound; to make a curvet.

> Anon he rears upright, curvets, and leaps. Shak.

2. To leap and frisk.

> Cry, holla! to thy tongue, I pr'ythee; it curvets unseasonably. Shak.

Curvet (kėr-vet'), v.t. pret. & pp. curvetted; ppr. curvetting. To cause to make a curvet; to cause to make an upward spring. 'The upright leaden spout curvetting its liquid filament into it.' Landor.

Curvicaudate (kėr-vi-kạ'dāt), a. [L. curvus, crooked, and cauda, a tail.] Having a curved or crooked tail.

Curvicostate (kėr-vi-kos'tāt), a. [L. curvus, crooked, and costa, a rib.] Marked with small bent ribs.

Curvidentate (kėr-vi-den'tāt), a. [L. curvus, crooked, and dens, dentis, a tooth.] Having curved teeth.

Curvifoliate (kėr-vi-fō'li-āt), a. [L. curvus, crooked, and folium, a leaf.] Having reflected leaves.

Curviform (kėrv'i-form), a. [L. curvus, crooked, and forma, a form.] Having a curved form.

Curvilinead (kėrv-i-lin'ē-ad), n. [See CURVILINEAR.] An instrument for describing curves.

Curvilinear, Curvilineal (kėrv-i-lin'ē-ėr, kėrv-i-lin'ē-al), a. [L. curvus, bent, and linea, a line.] Having a curve line; consisting of curve lines; bounded by curve lines; as, a curvilinear figure.

Curvilinearity (kėrv-i-lin'ē-ar''i-ti), n. The state of being curvilinear, or of consisting in curve lines.

Curvilinearly (kėrv-i-lin'ē-ėr-li), adv. In a curvilinear manner.

Curvinervate, Curvinerved (kėr-vi-nėrv'-āt, kėr-vi-nėrvd'), a. [L. curvus, crooked, and nervus, a nerve.] Having the veins or nervures curved.

Curving (kėrv'ing), n. A curve; a winding form.

Curvirostral (kėrv-i-ros'tral), a. [L. curvus, crooked, and rostrum, a beak.] In ornith. having a crooked beak, as the cross-bills.

Curvity (kėrv'i-ti), n. [L. curvitas, from curvus, crooked.] A bending in a regular form; crookedness.

Curvograph (kėrv'ō-graf), n. [L. curvus, crooked, and Gr. graphō, to write.] An arcograph (which see).

Cusco-china, Cusco-bark (kụs'kō-chī-na, kụs'kō-bärk), n. The bark of Cinchona pubescens, which comes from Cuzco in the southern parts of Lower Peru, and is exported from Arequipa. It contains a peculiar alkaloid called cusco-cinchonine, or cusconine, which resembles cinchonine in its physical qualities, but differs from it in its chemical properties. It is synonymous with aricine (which see). When applied medicinally it excites warmth in the system, and is therefore recommended to be given in cold intermittents and low typhoid states of the system.

Cusco-cinchonine, Cusconine (kụs'ko-sin-ko-nin, kụs'kō-nin), n. An alkaloid obtained from the bark of Cinchona pubescens. See CUSCO-CHINA.

Cuscus (kus'kus), n. A genus of marsupial quadrupeds found in Australia, now referred to Phalangista.

Cuscuta (kus'kū-ta or kus-kū'ta), n. [From kechout, its Arabic name.] Dodder, a genus of parasitic plants, nat. order Convolvulaceæ. They are slender, branched, leafless, twining, annual parasites, with small flowers in compact heads. About forty species are known from temperate and tropical regions. Two species are natives of England, C. europea, found on nettles, vetches, and other plants, and C. Epithymum, on furze, thyme, heather, clover, &c. Several exotic species have been introduced with cultivated seeds, as flax and clover.

Cushat (kụsh'at), n. [A. Sax. cusceote.] The ring-dove or wood-pigeon (Columba palumbus).

> Far ben thy dark green planting's shade
> The cushat croodles am'rously. Tannahill.

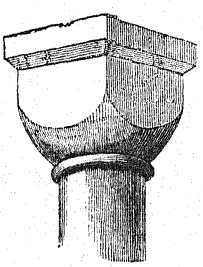
Cushew-bird (kush'ū-bėrd), n. Ourax pauxi, a bird resembling the curassow, but having a large, oval, bony knob of a fine blue colour on the upper mandible of its bill. It is sometimes called the galeated curassow.

Cushion (kụsh'on), n. [Fr. coussin; It. cuscino, as if from a hypothetical culcitinum, dim. of L. culcita, a cushion.] 1. A pillow for a seat; a soft pad to be placed on a chair; a bag stuffed with wool, cotton, hair, or other soft material.—2. Anything resembling a cushion, as any stuffed or padded surface. Specifically—(a) A bag of leather filled with sand, used by engravers to support the plate. (b) A stuffing of fine tow or wool, covered with leather, on a board, used by gilders for receiving the leaves of gold from the paper, in order to its being cut into proper sizes and figures. (c) The rubber of an electrical machine. See RUBBER. (d) The padded side or edge of a billiard-table.—3. A kind of dance formerly very common at weddings, in which a cushion played an important part.—Lady's cushion, a plant, a species of Saxifraga.—Sea-cushion, sea pink or thrift, a species of statice.

Cushion (kụsh'on), v.t. 1. To seat on or as on a cushion. 'Cushioned up in thrones.' Bolingbroke.—2. To furnish with cushions; as, to cushion a seat; to cushion a chaise.—3. To cover or conceal with or as with a cushion.



Norman Cushion-capital.

Cushion-capital (kụsh'on-kap-it-al), n. In arch. a capital so sculptured as to appear like a cushion pressed upon by the weight of its entablature, very common in Indian buildings; also applied to the Norman capital, consisting of a cube rounded off at its lower extremities.

Cushion-dance (kụsh'on-dans), n. Same as Cushion, 3.

Cushionet (kụsh'on-et), n. A little cushion.

Cushion-rafter (kụsh'on-raft-ėr), n. In arch. a principal brace (which see, under PRINCIPAL, a.).

Cushiony (kụsh'on-i), a. Cushion-shaped and soft.

> A bow-legged character with a flat and cushiony nose. Dickens.

Cusk (kusk), n. A northern British fish of the cod family, the tusk or torsk. See TORSK.

Cuskin† (kus'kin), n. A kind of drinking-cup.

Cusp (kusp), n. [L. cuspis, a point.] 1. In astron. the point or horn of the crescent moon or other crescent-shaped luminary.—2. In astrol. the beginning or first entrance of any house in the calculations of nativities.—3. In math. a term used for the point or corner formed by two branches of the same or different curves meeting and terminating there.—4. In arch. a term applied to the points of the small arcs or foliations terminating the internal curves of the trefoiled, cinque-foiled, &c., heads of Gothic windows and panels; also, the pendant of a pointed arch.—5. In zool. the prominence on the molar teeth.

Cusps.

1, Monument of Edw. III., Westminster Abbey (brass). 2, Henry VII.'s Chapel. 3, Monument of Sir James Douglas, Douglas Church. 4, Beauchamp Chapel, Warwick.

Cusparia-bark (kusp-ā'ri-a-bärk), n. Angostura-bark (which see).

Cusparin, Cusparine (kusp'a-rin, kusp'a-rin), n. A non-azotized crystallizable substance obtained from the bark of the true angostura (Cusparia febrifuga). It is soluble in alcohol, and slightly so in water.

Cuspated (kusp'āt-ed), a. Ending in a cusp or point; pointed. [Rare or obsolete.]

Cusped (kuspt), a. Furnished with a cusp; cusp-shaped.

> ture's wit. Shak.

Cutter-bar (kut'ėr-bär), n. In mech. the bar of a boring machine, in which the cutters or cutting tools are fixed, corresponding to the boring-bar of the boring-mill, for boring steam cylinders, &c. The cutters are fixed directly in recesses made in the cutter-bar, as represented by the figure, in which a is the cutter fixed in its place by the key b. In the case of the boring-bar the cutters are fixed round the circumference of a boring-block, which is carried along the bar by a parallel screw.

Cut-throat (kut'thrōt), n. A murderer; an assassin; a ruffian.

Cut-throat (kut'thrōt), a. Murderous; cruel; barbarous.

> You call me misbeliever, cut-throat dog,
> And spit upon my Jewish gaberdine. Shak.

Cutting (kut'ing), a. 1. Penetrating or dividing by the edge; serving to penetrate or divide; sharp; as, a cutting tool; the cutting teeth.—2. Piercing the heart; wounding the feelings; deeply affecting with shame or remorse; pungent; piquant; satirical; severe; as, a cutting reflection: applied to persons or things.

> But he always smiled; and audacious, cool, and > cutting, and very easy, he thoroughly despised mank-> kind. Disraeli.

> He (Sedley) was prosecuted for a misdemeanour, > was sentenced to a heavy fine, and was reprimanded > by the Court of King's Bench in the most cutting > terms. Macaulay.

3.† Thieving.

> Wherefore have I such a companie of cutting > knaves to wait upon me. Friar Bacon.

—Cutting-down line, in shipbuilding, a curve in the sheer-draught corresponding to the upper surface of the throats of the floors amidships, and to the under side of the keelson.

Cutting (kut'ing), n. 1. The act or operation of making an incision, of severing, felling, hewing, shaping, and the like.

> Ye shall not make any cuttings in your flesh.
> Lev. xix. 28.

2. A piece cut off; a slip; a portion of a plant from which a new individual is propagated when placed in the earth.—3. An excavation made through a hill or rising ground, in constructing a road, railway, canal, &c.—4. The action of a horse when he strikes the inner and lower part of the fetlock-joint with his hoof while travelling. 5. Division, as of a pack of cards.—6. Caper; curvet; as, 'changes, cuttings, turnings, and agitations of the body.' Floris.

Cuttingly (kut'ing-li), adv. In a cutting manner.

Cuttle, Cuttle-fish (kut'tl, kut'tl-fish), n. [A. Sax. cudele, a cuttle-fish; G. kuttel-fisch.] A name for any of the Cephalopoda, more strictly applied to those of the genus Sepia and family Sepiadæ, dibranchiate cephalopodous molluscs, with a depressed body, inclosed in a sac. The shorter arms or feet, eight in number, covered with four rows of raised discs or suckers, are arranged around the mouth, and from the midst of them extend two long tentacula, also furnished with discs. These members the animal uses in walking, swimming, for attaching itself to objects, and for seizing its prey. A tube or funnel exists below the head and leads from the gills; through this funnel the water admitted to these organs is expelled; and the creature, by ejecting the water with force, can dart backwards with amazing velocity. In a sac on the back of the mantle there is a light, porous, calcareous shell formed of thin plates. The cuttle-fish has the power of ejecting a black ink-like fluid—the sepia of artists (see SEPIA)—from a bag or sac, so as to darken the water and conceal it from pursuit. The species which frequents our coasts is S. officinalis, and is often found a foot long.

Cuttle† (kut'tl), n. [O.Fr. coultel; Fr. couteau, from L. cultellus, a knife; or possibly cut, on type of whittle, a knife, from white, to pare.] The knife used by a thief in cutting purses.

Cuttle-bone (kut'tl-bōn), n. The dorsal plate of Sepia officinalis, formerly much used in medicine as an absorbent, but now used for polishing wood, painting, varnishing, &c., as also for pounce and tooth powder.

Cuttoe (kut'tō), n. [Fr. couteau, a knife.] A large knife. [United States.]

Cutty (kut'i), n. [Scotch.] A slut; a worthless girl; a loose woman.

Cutty (kut'i), n. [Scotch.] 1. A short spoon.

> It is better to sup with a cutty than want a spoon.
> Scots proverb.

2. A short-stemmed tobacco-pipe.

> I'm no sae scant o' clean pipes, as to blaw wi' a > brunt cutty. Scots proverb.

Cutty (kut'ti), a. [Scotch.] Short; as, a cutty spoon. 'Her cutty sark o' Paisley harn.' Burns.

Cutty-stool (kut'ti-stōl), n. [From cutty, a wanton.] A seat in old Scottish churches, where acknowledged female offenders against chastity were seated during three Sundays, and publicly rebuked by their minister.

Cutwal (kut'wal), n. In the East Indies, the chief police-officer of a large city.

Cut-water (kut'wą-tėr), n. 1. The fore part of a ship's prow, which cuts the water.—2. The lower portion of the pier of a bridge, formed with an angle or edge directed up the stream, so as more effectually to resist the action of the water, ice, &c.—3. The razor-bill (Rhyncops nigra).

Cut-work† (kut'wėrk), n. Embroidery. B. Jonson.

Cutworm (kut'wėrm), n. Any worm or insect destructive to the young plants of cabbage, corn, beans, &c.

Cuvette (kü-vet), n. [Fr., dim. of cuve, from L. cupa, a tub.] 1. A surgical instrument shaped like a little scoop, used in taking away the opaque matter that may be left after extracting a cataract from the eye.—2. A large clay pot or crucible in which the materials of plate-glass are melted.—3. In fort. a trench dug in the middle of a large dry ditch; a cunette.

Cuzco-china, Cuzco-bark (kųz'kō-chī-na, kųz'kō-bärk), n. See CUSCO-CHINA.

Cwmry, Cwmric (kųm'ri, kųm'rik), n. and a. See CYMRY, CYMRIC.

Cwt. An abbreviation of hundredweight, c being the symbol for a hundred, and wt. the contraction for weight.

Cyamidæ (sī-am'i-dē), n. pl. [Gr. kyamos, a bean, and eidos, resemblance.] The family of crustaceans of which Cyamus is the sole genus. See CYAMUS.

Cyamus (sī'a-mus), n. A genus of læmodipodous Crustacea, the species of which are parasites on the whale. They are called Whale-lice.

Cyanamide (sī-an'a-mid), n. (CN_2H_2.) A white crystalline body prepared by the action of ammonia on chloride of cyanogen.

Cyanate (sī'an-āt), n. A salt of cyanic acid.

Cyanhydric (sī-an-hid'rik), a. In chem. hydrocyanic; prussic.

Cyanic (sī-an'ik), a. Pertaining to or containing cyanogen.—Cyanic acid, a compound of cyanogen and oxygen (CNHO).

Cyanide (sī'an-id), n. [Gr. kyanos, blue, and eidos, resemblance.] In chem. a combination of cyanogen with a metallic base; as, the cyanide of silver, of copper, &c.

Cyanin, Cyanine (sī'an-in), n. 1. The blue colouring matter of certain flowers, as of the corn-flower, violet, and species of iris.—2. A fugitive blue dye prepared from chinoline and iodide of amyl, used in calico-printing.

Cyanite (sī'an-īt), n. Same as Kyanite.

Cyanogen (sī-an'ō-jen), n. [Gr. kyanos, blue, and gennaō, to beget.] (C N.) Sym. Cy. A compound radicle, composed of one atom of nitrogen and one of carbon. It is a gas of a strong and peculiar odour, resembling that of crushed peach leaves, and burning with a rich purple flame. It is obtained by heating dry cyanide of mercury. Under a pressure of between three and four atmospheres it becomes a limpid liquid, and is highly poisonous and unrespirable. It unites with oxygen, hydrogen, and most other non-metallic elements, and also with the metals forming cyanides.

Cyanometer (sī-an-om'et-ėr), n. [Gr. kyanos, blue, and metron, measure.] A meteorological instrument contrived by Saussure for estimating or measuring degrees of blueness, as of the sky. It consists of a band of paste-board divided into fifty-one numbered compartments, each of which is painted of a different shade of blue, commencing at the one end with the deepest shade, formed by a mixture of black, and ending with the faintest, formed by a mixture of white. The hue of the object is measured by its correspondence with one of these shades.

Cyanopathy (sī-an-op'ath-i), n. [Gr. kyanos, blue, and pathos, suffering.] Cyanosis (which see).

Cyanosis (sī-an-ō'sis), n. [Gr. kyanōsis, blueness, a blue colour.] The blue disease; the blue jaundice of the ancients. It is usually due to malformation of the heart, whereby the venous and arterial currents mingle.

Cyanotype (sī-an'ō-tīp), n. [Cyanide, and Gr. typos, type.] A photographic picture obtained by the use of a cyanide.

Cyanurate (sī-an'ū-rāt), n. A salt of cyanuric acid.

Cyanuret (sī-an'ū-ret), n. A basic compound of cyanogen and some other element or compound; a cyanide.

Cyanuric (sī-an-ūr'ik), a. In chem. noting an acid ($C_3H_3N_3O_3$), the product of the decomposition of the solid chloride of cyanogen by water, of the soluble cyanates by dilute acids, of urea by heat, of uric acid by destructive distillation, &c. It is colourless, inodorous, and has a slight taste. It is a tribasic acid, and its salts are termed cyanurates.

Cyar (sī'ar), n. [Gr. kyar, a hole.] The orifice of the internal ear.

Cyatheaceous (sī-ath'ē-ā''shus), a. Of or belonging to the Cyatheæ.

Cyatheæ, Cyatheineæ (sī-ath'ē-ē', sī-ath'-ē-in''ē-ē), n. pl. A subdivision or tribe of polypodiaceous ferns, distinguished by the insertion of the sporanges on a projecting axis, the annulus of the sporanges being obliquely lateral. See CYATHEA.

Cyathea (sī-ā'thē-a), n. [Gr. kyatheion, a little cup, from kyathos, a cup.] A genus of arborescent ferns, order Polypodiaceæ. It is characterized by having the spores, which are borne on the back of the frond, inclosed in a cup-shaped indusium. There are many species scattered over the tropical regions of the world. Some have short stems, but in others they reach a height of 40 or 50 feet. The stems are crowned with a beautiful head of large fronds. C. medullaris, a fine bipinnated or tripinnated species of New Zealand and the Pacific Isles, and known in gardens as a noble tree-fern of comparatively hardy character, forms in its native country a common article of food. The part eaten is the soft, pulpy, medullary substance which occupies the centre of the trunk, and which has some resemblance to sago.

Cyathiform (sī-ath'i-form), a. [L. cyathus, a cup, and forma, shape.] In the form of a cup or drinking-glass, a little widened at the top: in bot. applied to cup-shaped organs, as to the circular crown of the flower of Narcissus.

Cyathiform.

Cybele (sī'be-lē), n. In class. myth. the name under which the goddess Rhea was worshipped in Phrygia.

Cybium (sī'bi-um), n. [Gr. kybion, the tunny-fish.] A genus of fishes, family Scomberidæ. A number of species are natives of the seas of the East Indies, and some are much esteemed for the table. One species, C. Commersoni, is used in a dried as well as in a fresh state.

Cycad (sī'kad), n. One of the Cycadaceæ.

Cycadaceæ (sī-ka-dā'sē-ē), n. A nat. order of gymnospermous plants, resembling palms in their general appearance, and, as a rule, increasing by a single terminal bud. The leaves are large and pinnate, and usually rolled up when in bud like a crozier. The microscopic structure of the wood as well as the general structure of their cones ally them with the conifers. The cones are of different sexes and on different plants. The seeds are borne on the margins of altered leaves in Cycas, and on the inner surface of the peltate scales of a cone in the other genera. The plants of this order inhabit India, Australia, Cape of Good Hope, and tropical America.

Cycadaceous (sī-ka-dā'shus), a. In bot. belonging to the nat. order Cycadaceæ.

Cycadiform (sī-kad'i-form), a. Resembling in form the cycads.

Cycadite (sī'ka-dīt), n. A fossil from the oolite and chalk formations, supposed to be allied to the existing Cycas.

Cycas (sī'kas), n. A genus of plants, nat. order Cycadaceæ. The species are natives of Asia, Polynesia, and Australia. They are trees with simple stems. The pollen is contained in valvate anthers on the under surface of scales, which are united into large cones. The seeds are borne on the edges of greatly altered leaves, produced in the regular series of the ordinary leaves. The starch in the large medulla is made into a coarse sago.

Cyclamen (sik'la-men), n. [From Gr. kyklikos, circular, referring to the corm or bulb-like root.] A genus of bulbous plants, nat. order Primulaceæ. The species are low-growing herbaceous plants, with very handsome flowers. Several of them are favourite spring-flowering greenhouse plants. An autumnal flowered species (C. hederæfolium) has become naturalized in the hedgebanks and copses of Kent and Sussex. The fleshy root-stocks, though acrid, are greedily sought after by swine; hence the vulgar name Sowbread.

Cyclamen (garden variety).

Cyclamine (sik'la-min), n. A vegetable principle found in the root of Cyclamen europæum. It is of a burning acrid taste, and has emetic and purgative properties.

Cyclantha (sik-lan'tha), n. A genus of plants, nat. order Pandanaceæ. The species inhabit tropical America. They have fan-shaped leaves, and unisexual flowers arranged in spiral bands around the spadix.

Cyclas (sīk'las), n. In antiq. an upper garment made of a rich stuff or silk manufactured in the Cyclades. It was worn by both sexes, was somewhat similar to the surcoat, and was embroidered or interwoven with gold.

Cycle (sī'kl), n. [Gr. kyklos, a circle or cycle.] 1. An imaginary circle or orbit in the heavens.

> How gird the sphere
> With centrick and concentrick, scribbl'd o'er > Cycle and epicycle, orb in orb. Milton.

2. A round of years, or period of time, in which a certain succession of events or phenomena is completed, and at the end of which the same course begins again; a periodical space of time marked by the recurrence of something peculiar; as, the cycle of the seasons or of the year.—3. A long period of years; an age.

> Better fifty years of Europe than a cycle of Cathay. Tennyson.

4. In literature, the aggregate of legendary or traditional matter accumulated round some mythical or heroic event or character, as the siege of Troy or the Argonautic expedition of antiquity, and the Round Table, the Cid, and the Nibelungs of mediæval times, and embodied in epic or narrative poetry or in romantic prose narrative.

> There superstition has more of interior belief and less of ornamental machinery than those to which the Amadis de Gaul and other heroes of the later cycles of romance furnished a model. Hallam.

5. In bot. a term employed in the theory of spiral leaf arrangement to express a complete turn of the spire, which is assumed to exist. 6. A bicycle, tricycle, or other vehicle of this class.—Cycle of the moon, or Metonic cycle. See METONIC.—Cycle of the sun is a period of twenty-eight years, which having elapsed, the dominical or Sunday letters return to their former place, and proceed in the former order, according to the Julian calendar.—Cycle of indiction, a period of fifteen years, at the end of which the Roman emperors imposed an extraordinary tax, to pay the soldiers who were obliged to serve in the army for that period and no longer.

Cycle (sī'kl), v.i. pret. & pp. cycled; ppr. cycling. 1. To recur in cycles.

> It may be that no life is found,
> Which only to one engine bound
> Falls off, but cycles always round. Tennyson.

2. To make use of a bicycle, tricycle, or similar conveyance.

Cyclic (sī'klik), a. [Gr. kyklikos, from kyklos, a circle.] 1. Pertaining to or moving in a cycle or circle. 'All the cyclic heavens around me spin.' E. B. Browning.—2. Connected with a cycle, in the sense it has in literature: specifically applied to certain ancient Greek poets (sometimes inclusive of Homer) who wrote on the Trojan war and the adventures of the heroes connected with it.—Cyclic chorus, in ancient Greece, the chorus which performed the songs and dances of the dithyrambic odes at Athens, dancing round the altar of Bacchus in a circle.

Cyclica (sī'klik-a), n. pl. [Gr. kyklos, a circle.] A family of tetramerous beetles, with bodies of a rounded or oval form.

Cyclical (sī'klik-al), a. 1. Pertaining to a cycle; cyclic.

> Time, cyclical time, was their abstraction of the Deity. Coleridge.

2. In bot. rolled up circularly, as many embryos.

Cyclist (sī'klist), n. A person who uses a bicycle or tricycle; a wheelman.

Cyclobranchiata (sī'klō-brangk'i-ā''tā), n. [Gr. kyklos, a circle, and branchia, gills.] An order of gasteropods, in which the branchiæ or organs of respiration form a fringe around the body of the animal, between the edge of the body and the foot. The order consists principally of the limpets.

Cyclogen (sī'klō-jen), n. [Gr. kyklos, a circle, and gennaō, to produce.] A dicotyledon with concentric woody circles; an exogen.

Cyclograph (sī'klō-graf), n. [Gr. kyklos, circle, and graphō, to describe.] An instrument for describing the arcs of circles.

Cycloid (sī'kloid), n. [Gr. kyklos, circle, and eidos, form.] 1. A curve generated by a point in the plane of a circle when the circle is rolled along a straight line, and kept always in the same plane. The genesis of the common cycloid may be conceived by imagining a nail in the circumference of a carriage-wheel; the curves which the nail describes while the wheel runs forward are cycloids. The cycloid is the curve of swiftest descent, that is, a heavy body descending by the force of its own gravity will move from one point of this curve to any other point in less time than it will take to move in any other curve which can be drawn between these points. Also, a body falls through any arc of an inverted cycloid in the same time whether the arc be great or small. In the figure let the circle BDA, of which the diameter is AB, make one revolution upon the straight line ABA, equal in length to its circumference, then the curved line ACAA, traced out by that point of the circle which was in contact with the point A in the straight line when the circle began to revolve, is called a cycloid. The following are some of its properties:—If the generating circle be placed in the middle of the cycloid, its diameter coinciding with the cycloidal axis AB, and from any point C in the curve there be drawn the tangent CF, the ordinate CDE perpendicular to the axis, and the chord AD be drawn from the upper extremity of the diameter to the point where the ordinate cuts the circle, then CD=the circular arc AD; the cycloidal arc AC=double the chord AD; the semi-cycloid ACA=double the diameter AB; and the tangent CF is parallel to the chord AD.—Curtate cycloid, the cycloid described when the generating point lies without the circumference of the circle; prolate or inflected cycloid, the cycloid described when the generating point lies within the circumference.—2. A fish of the order Cycloidei.

Cycloid (sī'kloid), a. [Gr. kyklos, circle, and eidos, form.] 1. Resembling a circle; having a circular form.—2. In zool. belonging to the order Cycloidei.—Cycloid scale. See SCALE.

Cycloidal (sī'kloid-al), a. Of or pertaining to a cycloid; as, the cycloidal space, that is, the space contained between the cycloid and its base.—Cycloidal pendulum, a pendulum so constructed as to vibrate in the arc of a cycloid, instead of a circular arc like the common pendulum. The vibrations of a cycloidal pendulum are perfectly isochronous.

Cycloidei (sī-kloid'ē-ī), n. pl. The fourth order of fishes according to the arrangement of M. Agassiz, having smooth, round or oval scales, as the salmon and herring. The scales are formed of concentric layers, not covered with enamel and not spinous on the margins; they are generally imbricated, but are sometimes placed side by side without overlapping.

Cycloidian (sī-kloid'i-an), a. Pertaining to the order of fishes termed Cycloidians.

Cycloidian (sī-kloid'i-an), n. A fish of the order Cycloidei.

Cyclolith (sī'klō-lith), n. [Gr. kyklos, a circle, and lithos, a stone.] In archæol. a circle formed by standing stones, popularly called a Druidical Circle.

Cyclometopita (sī'klō-mē-top"i-ta), n. pl. [Gr. kyklos, a circle, and metōpon, the front.] A tribe of brachyurous crustaceans, distinguished by a wide carapace, bowlike in front and narrower behind. It includes the genera Cancer, Portunus, Xantho, and Carcinus. The common edible crab is a well-known member of the tribe.

Cyclometry (sī-klom'et-ri), n. [Gr. kyklos, circle, and metreō, to measure.] The art of measuring circles.

Cyclone (sī'klōn), n. [Intens. from Gr. kyklos, a circle.] A circular or rotatory storm of immense force, varying from 200 to 500 miles in diameter, revolving round a calm centre, which advances at a rate varying from 2 to 30 miles an hour. Cyclones occur most frequently in those parts of the world subject to monsoons, and at the seasons when the monsoons are changing, and seem to be eddies formed by the meeting of opposing currents of air, which accounts for the fact that they revolve in opposite directions in the two hemispheres —in the southern with, and in the northern against, the hands of a watch—in consequence of which, and the progression of the centre, the strength of the storm in the northern hemisphere is greater on the south of the line of progression and weaker on the north, than it would be if the centre were stationary, the case being reversed in the southern hemisphere. Cyclones are preceded by a singular calm, and a great fall of the barometer.

Cyclonic (sī-klon'ik), a. Relating to a cyclone.

Cyclopædia, Cyclopedia (sī-klō-pē'di-a), n. [Gr. kyklos, circle, and paideia, discipline, erudition.] A work containing definitions or accounts of the principal subjects in one or all branches of science, art, or learning. See ENCYCLOPÆDIA.

Cyclopædic, Cyclopedic, Cyclopædical, Cyclopedical (sī-klō-pēd'ik, sī-klō-pēd'ik-al), a. Belonging to a cyclopædia.

Cyclopædist, Cyclopedist (sī'klō-pēd-ist), n. A writer in a cyclopædia; a compiler of a cyclopædia.

Cyclopean (sī-klō-pē'an), a. [From cyclops.] Pertaining to the Cyclops; vast; gigantic; in arch. a term applied to a very early or primitive style of building fabled to have been the work of the Cyclops. It is distinguished by the immense size of the stones and the absence of any cement. Its most frequent application was to walls of cities and fortresses. The walls of Tyrins, near Nauplia, mentioned by Homer, afford a good example of the more primitive style of Cyclopean architecture. There are three stages—in the first the stones, measuring from 6 to 9 feet long, from 3 to 4 feet wide, and from 2 to 3 feet deep, are mere rude irregular masses piled on each other; in the second they are polygonal, the sides of each block fitting close to those adjoining; and in the third they are squared and laid in courses. Examples occur in Greece, Italy, and Asia Minor. Called also Pelasgic.

Cyclopede (sī'klō-pēd), n. Cyclopædia (which see).

Cyclopic (sī-klop'ik), a. Pertaining to the Cyclops; gigantic; savage.

Cyclopidæ (sī-klop'i-dē), n. pl. [Gr. kyklos, a circle, ōps, the eye, and eidos, resemblance.] A family of minute one-eyed, entomostracous, marine and fresh-water crustacea, divided into many genera. They are exceedingly abundant, and are so prolific that, in one summer, a female may have become the progenitrix of more than four million descendants. They undergo many transformations before attaining maturity. Cyclops quadricornis, the common water-flea, is to be found in all our fresh-water ponds and ditches.

Cyclops (sī'klops), n. sing. and pl. [Gr. kyklōps—kyklos, a circle, and ōps, an eye.] In myth. a race of giants, the sons of Neptune and Amphitrite, who had but one circular eye in the middle of the forehead. They inhabited Sicily, and assisted Vulcan in making thunderbolts for Jupiter.

Cyclosis (sī-klō'sis), n. [Gr. kyklos, a circle.] In bot. that motion of fluids of plants which was supposed to pass through vessels of a peculiar kind, diffused through the system of plants without interruption.

Cyclostoma (sī-klos'tō-ma), n. [Gr. kyklos, a circle, and stoma, a mouth.] A genus of air-breathing gasteropods or snails, so called on account of the circular form of the aperture of the shell.

Cyclostome (sī'klō-stōm), a. Cyclostomous (which see).

Cyclostome (sī'klō-stōm), n. A fish of the order Cyclostomi.

Cyclostomi, Cyclostomata (sī-klos'tō-mī, sī-klō-stom'a-ta), n. pl. [Gr. kyklos, a circle, and stoma, a mouth.] A family of fishes (Cuvier's ninth order of cartilaginous fishes), which have circular mouths, as the lamprey: synonymous with Marsipobranchii.

Cyclostomidæ (sī-klō-stom'i-dē), n. pl. A family of pulmoniferous land-shells, of which the genus Cyclostoma is the type. See CYCLOSTOMA.

Cyclostomous (sī-klos'tom-us), a. [Gr. kyklos, a circle, and stoma, a mouth.] Having a circular mouth or aperture, as the shells of certain molluscs, and the order of fishes including the lamprey.

Cyclostylar (sī-klō-stīl'ėr), a. Composed of a circular range of columns without a core or interior building.

Cyder (sī'dėr), n. Same as Cider.

Cydonia (sī-dō'ni-a), n. [L., a quince; from Cydonia, a town in Crete; now Canea.] A genus of rosaceous plants nearly allied to the pear, but distinguished by its leafy calyx lobes, and the many-seeded cells of its fruits. The best known species is C. vulgaris (the quince). The seeds are used in medicine on account of the mucilage which they yield, and by hairdressers for preparing bandoline. C. japonica is an ornament in our gardens.

Cyesiology (sī-ē'si-ol"o-ji), n. [Gr. kyēsis, pregnancy, and logos, a discourse.] In physiol. the science which concerns itself with gestation.

Cygnet (sig'net), n. [Dim. of Fr. cygne, from L. cygnus, a swan.] A young swan.

So doth the swan her downy cygnets save. Shak.

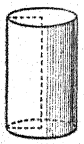
—Cygnet-royal, in her. a swan gorged with a ducal coronet, having a chain attached thereto and reflexed over the back.

Cygninæ (sig-nī'nē), n. pl. The swans, a sub-family of birds, of the order Natatores, family Anatidæ.

Cygnus (sig'nus), n. 1. The swan, a genus of web-footed birds belonging to the Anatidæ or duck family. See SWAN.—2. A northern constellation containing eighty-one stars. The bright stars in Aquila, Lyra, and Cygnus form a remarkable triangle.

Cylinder (si'lin-dėr), n. [Fr. cylindre, Gr. kylindros, from kylindō, kyleō, to roll.] 1. An elongated, round, solid body, of uniform diameter throughout its length, and terminating in two flat circular surfaces which are equal and parallel. In geom. the word has a wider signification, and may be defined as a figure of three dimensions inclosed by two flat and equal surfaces, bounded by any curve and lying in parallel planes and in similar situations, and one curved surface connecting the two in such a manner that any section of the figure parallel to either of the flat surfaces is equal and similarly situated to both. When the axis of the cylinder, that is, the line joining the centres of the two terminal surfaces, is at right angles to these the cylinder is termed right; otherwise it is an oblique cylinder.—2. In mech. (a) that chamber of a steam-engine in which the force of steam is exerted on the piston. See STEAM-ENGINE. (b) The barrel of an air-pump. (c) In certain printing machines a roller by which the impression is made, and on which, in some forms of the machine, the types or stereotype plates are secured, while in other forms they are not. (d) The bore of a gun. (e) The body of a pump.—3. In oriental antiq. a cylindrical stone covered with inscriptions, worn by the Babylonians, &c., as an amulet or seal. —Cylinder escapement, an escapement for watches invented by Graham. It corresponds to the dead-beat escapement in clocks.



Right Cylinder.

Cylinder-press (si'lin-dėr-pres), n. In printing, a form of press in which the impression is made by means of a cylinder instead of a flat surface. See under CYLINDER.

Cylindraceous† (si-lin-drā'shus), a. Cylindrical.

Cylindrenchyma (si-lin-dren'ki-ma), n. [Gr. kylindros, a cylinder, and enchyma, infusion.] In bot. tissue composed of cylindrical cells, such as that of Confervæ, and of many hairs, &c.

Cylindric, Cylindrical (si-lin'drik, si-lin'drik-al), a. Having the form of a cylinder, or partaking of its properties.—Cylindrical boiler, a boiler made in the shape of a cylinder, simple in construction, and admitting of greater resistance to the lateral action of the causes of displacement than most others, although more expensive in the matter of fuel.—Cylindrical lens, (a) a lens formed by two segments of cylinders, each segment having one flat and one rounded surface, and the two segments united at their flat surfaces, with the curve of the one at right angles to that of the other: used as a reading-glass. (b) A lens having a cylindrical body and convex lens; a Stanhope lens.—Cylindrical vaulting, in arch. the most ancient mode of vaulting; called also a waggon, barrel, tunnel, or cradle roof. It is, as its name implies, a plain half-cylinder, without either groins or ribs. Its vertical section is the arc of a circle.

Cylindrically (si-lin'drik-al-li), adv. In the manner or shape of a cylinder.

Cylindricity (si-lin-dris'i-ti), n. The condition of possessing a cylindrical form.

Cylindricule (si-lin'drik-ūl), n. A small cylinder. Prof. Owen.

Cylindriform (si-lin'dri-form), a. Having the form of a cylinder.

Cylindro-conical (si-lin'drō-kon"ik-al), a. In gun. a term applied to a shot, the body of which is cylindrical and the head conical in form.

Cylindro-conoidal (si-lin'drō-kōn-oid"al), a. In gun. a term applied to a shot having a cylindrical body and conoidal head.

Cylindro-cylindrical (si-lin'drō-si-lin"drik-al), a. A term applied to an arch formed by the intersection of a cylindrical vault with another cylindrical vault, of greater span and height, springing from the same level. See CROSS-VAULTING.

Cylindroid (si'lin-droid), n. [Gr. kylindros, a roller, and eidos, form.] A solid body, resembling a right cylinder, but having the bases elliptical, although parallel and equal.

Cylindrometric (si'lin-drō-met''rik), a. Belonging to a scale used in measuring cylinders.

Cylindro-ogival (si-lin'drō-ō-jīv''al), a. In gun. a term applied to a shot having a cylindrical body and ogival head.

Cyma (sī'ma), n. [Gr. kyma, a wave.] 1. In arch. a member or moulding of the cornice, the profile of which is a curve of contrary flexure. Of this moulding there are two kinds, cyma recta, which is concave at the top and convex at the bottom; and cyma reversa, which is convex at the top and concave at the bottom. Both kinds of the cyma are also called Ogee.—2. In bot. a cyme (which see).

1, Cyma recta. 2, Cyma reversa.

Cymaphen (sī'ma-fen), n. [Gr. kyma, a wave, and phainō, to show.] An apparatus in a telephone for receiving transmitted electric waves.

Cymar (si-mär'), n. A slight covering; a scarf. Written also Simar.

Her body shaded with a light cymar. Dryden.

Cymatium (si-mā'shi-um), n. [L., Gr. kymation, a little wave, from kyma, a wave.] In arch. same as Cyma (which see).

Cymba (sim'ba), n. [Gr. kymbē, the hollow of a vessel.] A genus of mollusca belonging to the family Volutidæ. The shell is obovate, tumid, ventricose, and covered with a strong epidermis and the pillar four-plaited. They are found on the African coast.

Cymbal (sim'bal), n. [L. cymbalum, Gr. kymbalon, a cymbal, from kymbos, hollow.] 1. A musical instrument, circular and hollow like a dish, made of brass or bronze, two of which are struck together, producing a sharp ringing sound.—2. An instrument made of a piece of steel wire, in a triangular form, on which are passed several rings, which are touched and shifted along the triangle with an iron rod held in the right hand, while the cymbal is supported in the left by a cord.

Cymbalist† (sim'bal-ist), n. One who plays the cymbals.

Cymbella (sim-bel'la), n. pl. In bot. a reproductive locomotive body, of an elliptical form, found in some algæ.

Cymbidium (sim-bid'i-um), n. A genus of tropical terrestrial orchids, often having spikes of beautiful flowers, on which account several of them are favourites in the greenhouse. They are chiefly from Asia and Africa.

Cymbiform (sim'bi-form), a. [L. cymba, a boat, and forma, form.] Shaped like a boat: applied to the seeds and leaves of plants, and also to a bone of the foot usually called os naviculare.

Cyme, Cyma (sīm, sī'ma), n. [Gr. kyma, anything swollen, a wave, the fœtus, a sprout, from kyō, to swell.] 1. In bot. an inflorescence of the definite or determinate class; any form of inflorescence in which the primary axis bears a single terminal flower which develops first, the inflorescence being continued by secondary, tertiary, and other axes. The secondary and other axes may be given off on both sides of the primary axis (a dichotomous cyme) or in such a way as to cause the inflorescence to assume a helicoid or scorpioid form (as in the forget-me-not).—2. In arch. same as Cyma.

Cyme.

Cymene (sī'mēn), n. ($C_{10}H_{14}$.) A hydrocarbon occurring in the volatile oil of Roman cumin, in camphor, the oil of thyme, &c. It is a colourless, strongly refracting liquid, and has a pleasant odour of lemons.

Cymiferous (sīm-if'ėr-us), a. [Gr. kyma, a sprout, and L. fero, to bear.] In bot. producing cymes.

Cyminum (si-mī'num). See CUMIN.

Cymling (sim'ling), n. A kind of squash.

Cymoid (sīm'oid), a. Having the form of a cyme.

Cymol (sī'mol), n. Same as Cymene.

Cymophane (sī'mō-fān), n. [Gr. kyma, a wave, and phainō, to show.] A siliceous gem of a yellowish-green colour, the same as Chrysoberyl (which see).

Cymophanous (sī-mof'an-us), a. Having a wavy floating light; opalescent; chatoyant.

Cymose, Cymous (sīm'ōs, sīm'us), a. Containing a cyme; in the form of a cyme: applied to aggregate flowers.

Cymothoadæ (sī-mō-thō'a-dē), n. pl. [Gr. kyma, anything swollen, thoōs, sharp, and eidos, resemblance.] A family of isopodous crustaceans, not unlike the wood-louse, inhabiting the northern seas. Cymothoa œstrum (the common fish-louse) is parasitic upon many species of fish, clinging tightly by means of its hooked legs.

Cymric, Cwmric (kim'rik), a. Of or pertaining to the Cymry.

Cymric, Cwmric (kim'rik), n. The language of the Cymry or ancient Britons; Welsh.

Cymry, Cwmry (kim'ri), n. [W. Cymmro, a Welshman, pl. Cymmry. Many conjectures have been formed regarding the origin of this word, but there seems little difficulty in assigning it to cymer, cymmer (cynver), a confluence of waters, the equivalent of Gael. inver, the word thus signifying the people dwelling on or near the confluence of waters, whether of two streams or of a river with the sea. Such localities would be the natural dwelling-places of the earliest tribes, as offering the richest pasturage. For alliances and derivation of cymmer, see ABER.] The name given to themselves by the Welsh. In its wider application the term is often applied to that portion of the Celtic race which appears to have at one time occupied all Britain, before they were expelled from the Highlands by the Gadhelic Scots, and from the Lowlands of Scotland and England by the Saxons and Scandinavians, and popularly known as the ancient Britons. Their longer-continued predominance in any locality is traced by the appearance of certain generic words in the place-names. Among these words are aber in place of Gaelic inver, pen for ben, a hill, dwr, water, caer, a fort, tre, town, uchel, high (as in Ochiltree, high town), pit, pitten (of uncertain meaning), llan, a church, cwm, a hollow, &c. By this test we infer that Cymry tribes had peopled the east coast of Scotland from the Firth of Forth to the Moray Firth and portions of the Lowlands, as well as the mountainous regions of the North of England and Cornwall, when the Gadhelic Scots were predominant in the Highlands, and the Teutons and Scandinavians in the rest of England and the Lowlands of Scotland. The Welsh, Bretons, and Cornishmen are Cymry.

Cymry, Cwmry (kim'ri), a. Of or pertaining to the Cymry or their language.

Cynanche (sīn-ang'kē), n. [Gr. kynangkē, a kind of sore throat, angina—kyōn, kynos, a dog, and anchō, to suffocate.] A disease of the throat or wind-pipe, attended with inflammation, swelling, and difficulty of breathing and swallowing. It is of several kinds, and comprehends the quinsy, croup, and malignant sore throat.

Cynanchum (sīn-ang'kum), n. [Gr. kyōn, kynos, a dog, and anchō, to suffocate—from its poisonous qualities.] A genus of plants, nat. order Asclepiadaceæ, one species of which (C. vomitorium) yields the ipecacuanha of the Isle of France. C. monspeliacum yields the black scammony of Montpellier.

Cynanthropy (sīn-an'thrō-pi), n. [Gr. kyōn, kynos, a dog, and anthrōpos, man.] A kind of madness in which a man imagines himself to be a dog, and imitates its voice and actions.

Cynara (sin'a-ra), n. [Gr. kynara, apparently a form of kinara, the artichoke.] A genus of plants, nat. order Compositæ, in many respects like the thistle, but having an involucre composed of thick fleshy spiny scales, and a remarkably thick fleshy receptacle covered over with numerous bristles. The two best-known species are the artichoke and the cardoon. The other species are prickly troublesome weeds.

Cynaraceæ, Cynarocephalæ (sīn-a-rā'sē-ē, sīn'a-rō-sef''a-lē), n. pl. [Cynara, and Gr. kephalē, the head.] One of the subdivisions of the nat. order Compositæ, of which the genus Cynara may be taken as the type. See CYNARA.

Cynaraceous (sīn-a-rā'shus), a. Of or pertaining to the division of plants Cynaraceæ.

Cynarctomachy (sīn-ärk-tom'a-ki), n. [Gr. kyōn, kynos, a dog, arktos, a bear, and machē, a fight.] Bear-baiting with a dog: a word humorously invented by Butler.

The same occult design doth lie
In bloody cynarctomachy. Hudibras.

Cynarocephalæ, n. pl. See CYNARACEÆ.

Cynarrhodon, Cynarrhodium (sīn-ä'ro-don, sīn-ä-rō'di-um), n. [Gr. kyōn, kynos, a dog, and rhodon, a rose.] In bot. a fruit in which the receptacle is deeply concave or urn-shaped, inclosed by the calyx, and bearing numerous bony achenes on its inner surface, as in the rose.

Cynegetics (sīn-ē-jet'iks), n. [Gr. kynēgetēs, a hunter—kyōn, kynos, a dog, and hēgeomai, to lead.] The art of hunting with dogs. [Rare.]

Cynic, Cynical (sin'ik, sin'ik-al), a. [Gr. kynikos, canine, from kyōn, kynos, a dog.] 1. Having the qualities of a surly dog; snarling; sneering; captious; surly; currish; austere.—2. Pertaining to the Dog-star.—3. Belonging to the sect of philosophers called Cynics; having the qualities of a cynic; resembling the doctrines of the Cynics. [The word in this sense may have been originally derived from Kynosarges, the name of the gymnasium in which Antisthenes, the founder of the sect, taught.]—Cynic spasm, a kind of convulsive spasm of the muscles of one side of the face, distorting the mouth, nose, &c., and causing, as it were, a grin.—Cynic year, the Sothiac or Sothic year, or canicular year. See SOTHIAC.

Cynic (sin'ik), n. 1. One of an ancient sect of philosophers who valued themselves on their contempt of riches, of arts, sciences, and amusements. They are said to owe their origin to Antisthenes of Athens.—2. A man of a currish temper; a surly or snarling man or philosopher; a sneering fault-finder; a follower of Diogenes; a misanthrope.

Cynically (sin'ik-al-li), adv. In a snarling, sneering, captious, or morose manner.

Cynicalness (sin'ik-al-nes), n. Moroseness; contempt of riches and amusements.

Cynicism (sin'i-sizm), n. The practice of a cynic; a morose contempt of the pleasures and arts of life.

This cynicism is for the most part affected. Hallam.

Cynictis (sin-ik'tis), n. [Gr. kyōn, kynos, a dog, and iktis, a kind of weasel.] A genus of carnivorous animals which form a connecting link between the family of the civets and that of the dogs. The general colour, as well as the whole external appearance, is precisely that of a small fox. The representative is found on the borders of Caffraria.

Cynipidæ (sin-ip'i-dē), n. pl. [L. cynips, the gall-fly, and Gr. eidos, resemblance.] The gall-flies, a family of hymenopterous insects, which, by means of their ovipositors, puncture plants, depositing their eggs, along, it is believed, with some irritant fluid which produces tumours on them, commonly called galls or nut-galls. The gall of commerce, the chief ingredient in the manufacture of ink, is caused by the Cynips gallæ tinctoriæ piercing a species of oak.

Cynips (sī'nips), n. A genus of hymenopterous insects, one species of which by its bite produces the excrescences on rose-trees called bedegar, and another is the insect by the puncture of which oak-galls are formed. See BEDEGAR.

Cynocephalus (sīn-ō-sef'a-lus), n. [Gr. kyōn, kynos, a dog, and kephalē, the head.] The genus of baboons having a head shaped like that of a dog. See BABOON.

Cynogale (sīn-og'a-lē), n. [Gr. kyōn, kynos, a dog, and galē, a weasel.] A genus of mammals, family Viverridæ, natives of Borneo, Malacca, and Sumatra. The species C. Bennettii, called in Borneo mampalon, is the most aquatic of all the family, its semi-retractile claws being partially webbed, and its soft fur resembling that of the otter. It inhabits damp places and banks of rivers.

Cynoglossum (sīn-ō-glos'sum), n. [Gr. kyōn, kynos, a dog, and glōssa, a tongue.] Hounds-tongue, a genus of plants, nat. order Boraginaceæ, consisting of herbs from the temperate zones. C. officinale and C. montanum are British plants. The former has a disagreeable smell, like that from mice, and was at one time used as a remedy in scrofula. There are about fifty other species, all coarse plants.

Cynography (sin-og'ra-fi), n. [Gr. kyōn, kynos, a dog, and graphō, to write.] A history of the dog.

Cynomoriaceæ (sīn-ō-mō'ri-ā''sē-ē), n. pl. An obscure order of rhizanths, distinguished from Balanophoraceæ by their distinct stamens and the imperfect perianth of the male flower. The order is represented by Cynomorium coccineum, the Fungus melitensis of the old herbalists. See CYNOMORIUM.

Cynomorium (sī-nō-mō'ri-um), n. [Gr. kynomorion, a kind of broom-rape.] A genus of plants, nat. order Cynomoriaceæ. C. coccineum is a small plant which grows in Sicily, Malta, and Gozo, but most abundantly on a rock in the last island, valued by the old herbalists as an astringent and styptic in cases of dysentery and hæmorrhage. It was held in such esteem by the Knights of Malta that it was carefully deposited in stores, from which the grand-master sent it in presents to sovereigns, hospitals, &c.

Cynorexia (sīn-ō-reks'i-a), n. [Gr. kyōn, kynos, a dog, and orexis, appetite.] An insatiable, voracious appetite, like that of a dog.

Cynosure (sīn'o-zhör), n. [Gr. kynosoura, lit. dog's tail, the constellation of the Little Bear, said to be so named from the curved position of certain of its stars—kyōn, kynos, a dog, and oura, tail.] 1. An old name of the constellation Ursa Minor, or the Little Bear, an inconspicuous constellation near the north pole, but noteworthy as containing the pole-star, which forms the tip of the tail; thus the eyes of mariners were, in ancient times, frequently directed to it. Hence—2. Anything that strongly attracts attention; a centre of attraction.

> Where perhaps some beauty lies,
> The cynosure of neighb'ring eyes. Milton.

Cynosurus (sīn-o-sū'rus), n. Dog's-tail grass, a genus of grasses with the flower spikelets forming a unilateral spike. A small number of species belong to the genus, natives of the northern temperate regions. C. cristatus and C. echinatus are British species. See DOG'S-TAIL GRASS.

Cynthia (sin'thi-a), n. 1. In myth. one of the names given to Diana.—2. In zool. a subgenus of Ascididæ, and a genus of lepidopterous insects, containing the painted lady-butterfly (Cynthia cardui).—3. A genus of crustaceans.

Cyon† (sī'on). See CION and SCION.

Cyophoria (sī'o-fō'ri-a), n. [Gr. kyos, fœtus, and phoreō, to carry, to bear.] In med. the time of gestation or carrying the fœtus.

Cyperaceæ (sī-pėr-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. [See CYPERUS.] The sedge family, a nat. order of monocotyledonous plants nearly allied to the grasses. The plants of this order are grassy or rush-like generally perennial herbs, with solid often triangular stems, and leaves with closed sheaths. The small flowers are borne in the axil of each glumaceous bract. The fruit is a small coriaceous achene. The plants are found in all climates, and form a large proportion of our coarser pastures, but are little eaten by cattle. Some club-rushes are used for making mats, chair-bottoms, &c. The papyrus of Egypt was made from the stems of Cyperus Papyrus.

Cyperaceous (sī-pėr-ā'shus), a. Belonging to or resembling plants of the family Cyperaceæ or sedges and their congeners.

Cyperus (sī'pėr-us), n. [Gr. kyperos, an aromatic plant.] A genus of plants, nat. order Cyperaceæ. They are herbs with compressed spikelets of many flowers, found in cold climates, and represented in our British flora by two very rare marsh plants which occur in the south of England—C. longus, the galingale, and C. fuscus.

Cyphella (sī-fe'li-a), n. pl. [Apparently from Gr. kyphella, the hollows of the ears.] In bot. collections of gonidia in the form of cups: used only in speaking of lichens.

Cyphella (sī-fel'la), n. pl. [Gr. kyphella, the hollows of the ears.] Pale tubercle-like spots on the under surface of the thallus of lichens.

Cypher (sī'fėr), n. Same as Cipher.

Cyphonidæ (sī-fon'i-dē), n. pl. [Gr. kyphōn, a crooked piece of wood, and eidos, resemblance.] A group of beetles detached from the Cebrionidæ on account of their small size, hemispheric, depressed, or ovate, and rather soft bodies, and furcate labial palpi. They are of dull colours, and are found attached to plants in damp situations. They fly and run with agility. In some species the hind legs are formed for leaping.

Cyphonism (sī'fon-izm), n. [Gr. kyphōn, a kind of pillory in which slaves or criminals were fastened by the neck.] A species of punishment frequently resorted to by the ancients, which is supposed by some to have consisted in besmearing the criminal with honey, and then exposing him to insects; while others think that it means the kind of punishment still used in China, known to Englishmen as the 'wooden collar,' whereby the neck is bent or weighed down.

Cypræa (sī-prē'a), n. The cowry, a genus of molluscs, the type of the family Cyprædæ. See COWRY.

Cyprædæ (sī-prē'i-dē), n. The cowry family, a family of marine gasteropodous molluscs, well known in commerce from one of the species being used in some parts of the East as a circulating medium. See COWRY.

Cy près (sē prā). [O.Fr., as near to.] In law, an equitable doctrine thus applied:—When there is an excess in an appointment under a power executed by will, affecting real estate, the court will carry the power out as near to (cy près) the testator's intention as practicable, and prevent such excess disappointing the general design. This doctrine is not applicable to personalty, but is confined to wills. In regard to charitable legacies, where a literal execution becomes inexpedient or impracticable, the court will execute it as nearly as it can according to the original purpose, or, as the technical expression is, cy près.

Cypress (sī'pres), n. [O.Fr. cypres, Gr. kyparissos.] 1. The popular name of Cupressus, a genus of coniferous trees. Among the most remarkable are C. sempervirens or common cypress, the evergreen American cypress or white cedar, and C. disticha or deciduous American cypress. Two Californian species, C. Lawsoniana and C. macrocarpa, have attained much favour in our shrubberies and gardens as ornamental evergreen trees. The wood of various species of cypress is remarkable for its durability. The coffins in which the Athenian heroes were deposited are said to have been made of the first species, and some authorities are inclined to believe that the gopher-wood of which Noah's ark was built was also of this species, the similarity of the names somewhat strengthening the supposition.—2. The emblem of mourning for the dead, cypress branches having been anciently used at funerals.

> Had success attended the Americans, the death of Warren would have been sufficient to damp the joys of victory, and the cypress would have been united with the laurel. Elliot's Biog.

Cypress (sī'pres), a. Belonging to or made of cypress.

Cyprian (sī'pri-an), a. 1. Belonging to the island of Cyprus.—2. A term applied to a lewd woman.

Cyprian (sī'pri-an), n. 1. A Cypriot.—2. A lewd woman; a courtesan; a strumpet.

Cypridæ, Cyprididæ (sī'pri-dē, sī-prid'i-dē), n. pl. [Gr. Kypris, one of the names of Venus, and eidos, likeness.] A family of minute crustaceans, of which the genus Cypris is the type. See CYPRIS.

Cypridina (sī-pri-dī'na), n. [Gr. Kypris, one of the names of Venus.] A genus of marine crustaceans. See under CYPRIDINIDÆ.

Cypridinidæ (sī-pri-din'i-dē), n. pl. [From Cypridina, the typical genus, and Gr. eidos, likeness.] A family of marine crustaceans consisting of one genus, Cypridina, having two compound eyes wide apart and two pairs of feet, one pair being always within the shell. The shell is oval, sharply pointed at each end, and the front edge is deeply notched. The pair of feet retained within the shell are modified to form a single organ, which seems to be intended to support the eggs. Several species are found in British seas.

Cyprine (sī'prin), a. Pertaining to a fish of the genus Cyprinus, of which the carp is a species.

Cyprine (sī'prin), a. Of or belonging to the cypress.

Cyprine (sī'prin), n. A species of idocrase of a blue tint, supposed to be due to the presence of copper.

Cyprinidæ (sī-prin'i-dē), n. pl. [Gr. kyprinos, a carp, and eidos, resemblance.] A family of teleostean fishes of the section Malacopterygii Abdominales, the species of which are distinguished by having the mouth small and generally devoid of teeth, the pharyngeal bones furnished with strong teeth, the branchiostegal rays few in number, and the scales generally of large size. The genus Cyprinus is the type of the family, which, besides the carp, contains the gold-fish, tench, roach, loach, bleak, barbel, &c.

Cyprinodontidæ (sī-prin'ō-dont''i-dē), n. pl. [Gr. kyprinos, a carp, odous, odontos, a tooth, and eidos, resemblance.] A family of malacopterygious fishes, allied to Cyprinidæ, with which they were formerly ranked, but differing from them in having the jaws more protractile and toothed. It includes the Anableps, peculiar for the conformation of its eyes, and some species inhabiting lakes at a great elevation on the Andes. These are greatly esteemed for the table.

Cyprinus (si-prin'us), n. A genus of fishes, including the carp, forming the type of the family Cyprinidæ. The genus is thus characterized: head naked; branchiostegal rays flat and broad; anal fin short; inhabit fresh waters. See CYPRINIDÆ.

Cypriot (si'pri-ot), n. An inhabitant of Cyprus.

Cypripedium (sī-pri-pēd'i-um), n. [Gr. Kypris, Venus, and a Latinized form of pedion, a slipper.] Lady's slipper, a genus of plants of the nat. order Orchidaceæ, consisting of numerous species of large-flowered terrestrial herbs, many of which are in cultivation. Only one species (C. Calceolus) is a native of Britain. Its conspicuous flower consists of large spreading red-brown sepals and petals, and an obovoid pale yellow lip. It is a very rare, if not almost extinct, plant in limestone woods in the north of England.

Cypris (sī'pris), n. [Gr. Kypris, Venus.] A genus of minute fresh-water crustacea, which have the body inclosed in a delicate shell, and which swim by means of cilia; they swarm in stagnant water. Fossil shells under the generic term Cypris occur in all rocks from the coal measures upwards.

Cyprus† (sī'prus), n. A thin transparent black stuff; a kind of crape.

> Lawn as white as driven snow,
> Cyprus black as e'er was crow. Shak.

Cyprus-lawn (sī'prus-lạn), n. Same as Cyprus. Milton.

Cypsela (sip'se-la), n. [Gr. kypselē, any hollow vessel.] In bot. a one-celled, one-seeded, indehiscent, inferior fruit, with the integuments of the seed not cohering with the endocarp, and of which the ovary was compound, or furnished with two or more styles or stigmas, as the fruit of the Compositæ; it only differs from an achenium in being inferior, and having had more than one style or stigma, and is seldom distinguished.

Cypselidæ (sip-sel'i-dē), n. pl. A family of insessorial birds, sub-order Fissirostres, including the swifts and their congeners. The main peculiarity in this family is that the nind toe is turned forward along with the three anterior toes. Besides the genus Cypselus the family includes also Acanthylis (North American chimney-swallow) and Collocalia (esculent swallow).

Cypselus (sip'se-lus), n. [Gr. kypselos, a swift.] The genus of birds to which the swift (C. apus) belongs. See SWIFT.

Cyrenaic (sī-re-nā'ik), a. 1. Pertaining to Cyrene, a Greek colony on the north coast of Africa.—2. Pertaining or belonging to the school of Epicurean philosophers founded by Aristippus, a disciple of Socrates, at Cyrene.

Cyrenian (sī-rē'ni-an), n. A native or inhabitant of Cyrene.

Cyrillaceæ (sī-ril-lā'sē-ē), n. pl. A nat. order of small evergreen, dicotyledonous trees or shrubs, nearly allied to the Ericaceæ. There are about six known species, constituting four genera, all natives of North or Tropical America.

Cyrillic (sī-ril'ik), a. [From St. Cyril, its reputed inventor.] The term applied to an alphabet adopted by all the Slavonic peoples belonging to the Eastern Church. It is believed to have superseded the Glagolitic as being easier both for the copyist to write and the foreigner to acquire. Some of its signs are modified from the Glagolitic, but those which Greek and Slavonic have in common are taken from the Greek. It was brought into general use by St. Cyril's pupil, Clement, first bishop of Bulgaria.

Cyriologic (sī'ri-o-loj''ik), a. [Gr. kyrios, chief, and logos, discourse.] Relating or pertaining to capital letters.

Cyrtostyle (sėr'tō-stīl), n. [Gr. kyrtos, bent, curved, and stylos, a pillar.] A circular portico projecting from the front of a building.

Cyst (sist), n. [Gr. kystis, a bladder.] 1. In physiol. a hollow organ with thin walls, as the urinary bladder or the gall bladder.—2. In pathol. a bladder-like bag or vesicle which includes morbid matter in animal bodies.

Cysted (sist'ed), a. Inclosed in a cyst.

Cystic (sist'ik), a. 1. Pertaining to, or contained in, a cyst; specifically, pertaining to, or contained in, the urinary or gall bladders; as, cystic remedies; cystic bile; cystic calculi.—2. Having cysts; cystose; as, cystic sarcoma.—3. Formed in, or shaped like, a cyst; as, cystic Entozoa.—Cystic duct, the membranous canal that conveys the bile from the hepatic duct into the gall-bladder.—Cystic artery, a branch of the hepatic.—Cystic worm. See TAPE-WORM.

Cystica (sis'ti-ka), n. [Gr. kystis, a bladder.] A term applied to immature Entozoa, in which the body is terminated by a cyst peculiar to one individual, or common to many. The hydatid in the brain of sheep is an example.

Cysticercus (sis-ti-sėr'kus), n. [Gr. kystis, a bladder, and kerkos, the tail.] An immature form of tape-worm found in various mammals. The cysticercus of the mouse, swallowed by the cat, becomes the tape-worm of the latter animal.

Cysticle (sist'i-kl), n. In physiol. a small cyst.

> In some Acalephæ the cysticles are not complicated with pigment cells. Prof. Owen.

Cystideæ (sist-id'ē-ē), n. pl. [Gr. kystis, a bladder, and eidos, resemblance.] A family of fossil echinoderms, with feebly developed arms, occurring in the Silurian and carboniferous strata.

Cystidean (sist-id'ē-an), n. A member of the fossil family Cystideæ.

Cystidia (sist-id'i-a), n. pl. [Gr. kystis, a bladder, and eidos, resemblance.] In bot. salient cells, accompanying the asci of fungi; by some regarded as antheridian cells.

Cystine (sis'tin), n. ($C_3H_7NSO_2$.) A yellowish-coloured mass occurring in a rare kind of urinary calculus.

Cystirrhœa (sis-tir-rē'a), n. [Gr. kystis, a bladder, and rheō, to flow.] Discharge of mucus from the bladder; vesical catarrh.

Cystis (sist'is), n. Same as Cyst.

Cystitis (sis-tī'tis), n. Inflammation of the bladder.

Cystitome (sist'i-tōm), n. [Gr. kystis, and tomos, cutting, from temnō, to cut.] An instrument for opening the capsule of the crystalline lens.

Cystocarp (sist'o-kärp), n. [Gr. kystis, a bladder, and karpos, fruit.] A capsule, containing many spores, found among the algæ; a conceptacle.

Cystocele (sist'ō-sēl), n. [Gr. kystis, a bladder, and kēlē, a tumour.] A hernia or rupture formed by the protrusion of the urinary bladder.

Cystolith (sist'ō-lith), n. [Gr. kystis, a bag, a cell, and lithos, a stone.] In bot. a name given to certain bodies consisting of a matrix of cellulose with carbonate of lime crystallized in a kind of efflorescence on the surface. They occur most frequently beneath the epidermis of the leaf, but are found also in deep-seated organs. They are most abundant in the families of the Urticaceæ and Acanthaceæ.

Cystolithic (sist-ō-lith'ik), a. In med. relating to stone in the bladder.

Cystopteris (sist-op'tėr-is), n. [Gr. kystis, a bladder, and pteris, a fern—from its bladder-like indusium.] Bladder-fern, a genus of polypodiaceous delicate flaccid ferns, having the sori borne on the back of the leaf on the middle of a vein and covered with a membranaceous indusium attached only by the base. They are found in cool damp localities. Two are natives of Britain, C. fragilis (the brittle fern), found in suitable localities everywhere, and C. montana, a very rare species found on the alpine mountains of the centre of Scotland.

Cystose (sist'ōs), a. Containing or resembling a cyst; cystic.

Cystotome (sist'ō-tōm), n. [Gr. kystis, the bladder, and tomos, cutting.] In surg. an instrument for cutting the bladder, sometimes but improperly called a Lithotome.

Cystotomy (sist-ot'ō-mi), n. [Gr. kystis, a bladder, and tomos, cutting, from temnō, to cut.] The act or practice of opening encysted tumours, for the discharge of morbid matter; specifically, the operation of cutting into the bladder for the extraction of a stone or other extraneous matter.

Cystula (sist'ū-la), n. [L. dim. of cyst.] In bot. a round closed apothecium in lichens. The term is also applied to the little open cups on the upper surface of the fronds in Marchantia.

Cythere (sī-thē'rē), n. A genus of minute entomostracous bivalve crustaceans, of marine habit, and found fossil in many formations, but most abundantly in the chalk and older tertiaries.

Cytherean (si-the-rē'an), a. [Gr. Kythera, Cerigo, an island in the Egean Sea, near the coast of which Venus was fabled to have risen from the sea, and where she was specially worshipped.] Pertaining to Venus.

Cytinaceæ (si-tin-ā'sē-ē), n. A small nat. order of rhizanths, the type of which is Cytinus Hypocistis, a rich yellow or orange-red scaly parasite growing on the roots of species of Cistus in the Mediterranean region.

Cytisine (si'ti-sin), n. A bitter principle detected in the seeds of the Cytisus Laburnum and other plants. It is of a nauseous taste, emetic, and poisonous.

Cytisus (si'ti-sus), n. [L., the laburnum.] A genus of hardy, leguminous, papilionaceous shrubs, natives almost exclusively of the countries bordering on the Mediterranean. The leaves are usually composed of three leaflets, some species are leafless. The large flowers are yellow, purple, or white. One species, C. Scoparius (broom), is an extremely common shrub on uncultivated grounds, heaths, &c., of most parts of Britain. Some exotic species are common garden and shrubbery plants, as C. Laburnum (the laburnum), C. purpureus, an elegant procumbent shrub used in rock-work, C. alpinus, &c. See BROOM.

Broom (Cytisus Scoparius).

Cytoblast (sī'tō-blast), n. [Gr. kytos, a cavity, and blastanō, to sprout.] In physiol. the nucleus, cellule, or centre of assimilative force, from which the organic cell is developed.

> The ducts, vessels, woody fibre, &c., of all vegetables are formed originally from cells; these cells are formed from what are called cytoblasts. In the interior of a cell may be seen, by the aid of high-power magnifiers, small granular-looking globules, and amongst these are to be found two or three larger bodies termed nuclei; and these contain within them smaller yet granular substances, the nucleoli; these nuclei and their contained nucleoli are the rudiments of the future new cell, and constitute the cytoblast. Chambers' Mixcell.

Cytoblastema (sī'tō-blas-tē''ma), n. [See CYTOBLAST.] The amorphous protein-substance by which animal and vegetable cells are formed, or of which they are wholly composed. Called also Protoplasm.

Cytogenesis (sī-tō-jen'e-sis), n. [Gr. kytos, a cell, and genesis, origin.] In physiol. the development of cells in animal and vegetable structures.

Cytogenetic (sī'tō-jen-et''ik), a. In physiol. relating or pertaining to cell formation.

Cytogeny (sī-to'je-ni), n. Cytogenesis (which see).

Cytryne,† a. Of a pale yellow or citron colour. Chaucer.

Czar (zär or tsär), n. [O. Pol. czar, now car (pron. tsar), perhaps a corruption of L. Cæsar.] A king; a chief; a title of the Emperor of Russia. The title was first adopted in 1579 by Ivan II., who styled himself Czar of Moscow.

Czarevna (zä-rev'na), n. The wife of the czarowitz.

Czarina (zä-rē'na), n. A title of the Empress of Russia.

Czarinian (zä-rin'i-an), a. Pertaining to the Czar, or Czarina, of Russia.

Czarish (zär'ish), a. Pertaining to the Czar of Russia. [Rare.]

> His czarish majesty despatched an express to General Goltz with an account of these particulars. Tatler.

Czarowitz, Czarevitch, Czarewitch, &c. (zär'ō-vits, zär'e-vich), n. The title of the eldest son of the Czar of Russia.

D.

D, in the English alphabet, is the fourth letter and the third consonant. D represents a dental sound, formed by placing the tip of the tongue against the root of the upper teeth, and then forcing up vocalized breath, or voice, into the mouth, the soft palate being raised to prevent its escape through the nose. T is formed in the same way except that it is uttered with breath merely, and not with voice. (See T.) When d follows a whispered, non-vocal, or surd consonant in the same syllable it takes the sound of t, as after k, p, f, s. This is especially seen in past tenses in -ed, the e not being sounded; as, picked (=pikt), wrapped (=rapt), hoped (=hōpt), snuffed (=snuft), kissed (=kist), &c. It is never silent in English words, except in a rapid utterance of such words as handkerchief. D has crept into some English words to which it does not properly belong, as in thunder, gender, sound (L. sonus), lend, hind (a servant), round (to whisper); it has disappeared from gospel and answer. According to Grimm's law in words common to English and to Sanskrit, Greek, Latin, and German, where d appears in English we find dh in Sanskrit, th in Greek, f in Latin, and t in German; thus E. door = Skr. dhvâra, Gr. thyra, L. fores, G. tōr.—As a numeral, D represents 500, and when a dash or stroke is placed over it thus, D, it denotes 5000.—In music, D is the second note of the natural scale, answering to the French and Italian re.

Dab (dab), v.t. pret. & pp. dabbed; ppr. dabbing. [Allied to O.D. dabben, to dabble, probably also to dub; comp. Fr. dauber, to cuff. See DAUB.] 1. To strike gently with the hand; to slap; to box.—2. To strike gently with some soft or moist substance.

Daguerrean, Daguerreian (da-ger'ē-an), a. Pertaining to Daguerre, or to his invention of the daguerreotype.

Daguerreotype (da-ger'ō-tīp), n. 1. The name given to an invention of M. Daguerre, of Paris, first published in 1839, by which the lights and shadows of a landscape or figure are fixed on a metallic plate solely by the action of the sun's actinic or chemical rays. A plate of copper, thinly coated with silver, is exposed in a close box to the action of the vapour of iodine; and when it assumes a yellow colour it is placed in the chamber of a camera obscura, where it receives an image of the object to be represented. It is then withdrawn and exposed to the vapour of mercury to bring out the impression distinctly; after which it is plunged into a solution of hypo-sulphite of soda, and lastly washed in distilled water. The process is then complete, and the sketch produced is in appearance something similar to aquatint but greatly superior in delicacy, and such is the precision of the detail, that the most powerful microscope serves but to display the perfection of the copy. See PHOTOGRAPHY.—2. A picture produced by the above process.

Daguerreotype (da-gėr'o-tīp), v.t. 1. To produce by the photographic process, as a picture.—2. To impress with great distinctness; to imitate exactly.

Daguerreotyper, Daguerreotypist (da-ger'ō-tīp-ėr, da-ger'ō-tīp-ist), n. One who takes pictures by means of daguerreotype.

Dahabieh (da-ha-bē'ā), n. A kind of boat in use on the Nile for the conveyance of travellers, and having one or two masts with a long yard supporting a triangular sail. It is of considerable breadth at the stern, which is rounded, but narrow towards the prow, which terminates in a sharp, gracefully curving cutwater. Dahabiehs are of various sizes, and afford good accommodation for from two to six or eight passengers. There is a deck fore and aft, on the centre of which are the seats for the rowers, when oars are needed to propel the boat. On the fore part of the deck is the kitchen, and on the after part there is raised a large cabin, which provides a sitting-room and sleeping accommodation for the passengers. The top of this cabin affords an open-air promenade, and has often an awning stretched above it.

Dahlgren Gun (dâl'gren gun), n. A gun introduced into the United States service by an officer named Dahlgren, of that navy. Its chief peculiarity is that it presents a small quantity of metal in front of the trunnions and a comparatively large quantity behind.

Dahlia (dā'li-a), n. [From Dahl, a Swedish botanist.] A genus of plants, nat. order Compositæ, of which several species are known, all natives of Mexico and Central America. The D. variabilis sports into such endless varieties in stature, leaves, and flowers, that it has become one of the most extensively cultivated florist's plants. Its innumerable sorts are the glory of our gardens in the autumn. As the plants do not bear frost, the roots are taken up during winter. The dahlia was introduced into England in the end of last century, but was not a general favourite in our gardens till about 1814.

Dahlin, Dahline (da'lin), n. ($C_6H_{10}O_5$.) Inuline (which see).

Daidle (dā'dl), v.t. [A corruption of daggle.] To draggle; to bemire. [Scotch.]

Dalmatian (dal-mā'shi-an), a. Of or pertaining to Dalmatia.—Dalmatian dog, a variety of the canine race, known also by the names of Danish, Spotted, or Coach Dog. It is distinguished from all other varieties by its numerous black spots. Its form is rather elegant, partaking both of the hound and pointer. It is kept chiefly as an appendage to the carriage, and shows an instinctive fondness for the stable.

Dalmatica, Dalmatic (dal-ma'ti-ka, dal-ma'tik), n. The vestment used by the deacon at mass, so called from first coming from Dalmatia. It is worn also by bishops under the chasuble, and from a very early period was worn by the popes when officiating pontifically. Thus Jean Diacre makes mention of the dalmatic of St. Gregory the Great. It consists of a long robe with larger and fuller sleeves than the tunic, which it resembled in general shape. The sides are left partially unclosed, and the vestment is occasionally ornamented with orphreys and fringes. It has longitudinal stripes before and behind, these stripes originally being of a black colour, but in later times red.

Dalmatica, Cathedral of Chartres (twelfth century).

A similar robe was worn by kings at high solemnities, as at coronations, and continues still to be worn by the sovereigns of England on these occasions as a super-tunic over the tunic surcoat.

Dalriad (dal'ri-ad), n. [Ir., one of the race of Riada, or Caibre Righfada, 'Caibre of the long arm,' a noted prince of the Scots in Ireland in the third century.] One of a tribe of the Scots in Ireland, which occupied the southern part of the county of Antrim. It is unknown when the first Dalriads passed over into Scotland, but it is certain that some of them went over in 506 led by Loarn, Fergus, &c., and settled in the west of Argyle, founding the kingdom of 'Dalriada in Albany.' The term was afterwards changed for Scot.

Dalriadic (dal-ri-ad'ik), a. Of or pertaining to the Dalriads, or their country.

Dal segno (dal sān'yō). [It., from the sign.] In music, a direction to go back to the sign 𝄋, and repeat from thence to the close.

Faithless, forsworn, ne goddess was thy dam. Surrey.

3. A crowned man in the game of draughts. [Local.]

Dam (dam), n. [A.Sax. seems to possess only the verb demman, to dam; the noun is seen in Sw. and G. damm; Dan. and D. dam, as in Amster*dam*, Rotter*dam*, &c.; Lith. tama, a dam.] 1. A mole, bank, or mound of earth, or any wall, or a frame of wood, raised to obstruct a current of water, and to raise it, for the purpose of driving mill-wheels, or for other purposes; any work that stops and confines water in a pond or basin, or causes it to rise.

As when the sea breaks o'er its bounds,
And overflows the level grounds,
Those banks and dams, that like a screen
Did keep it out, now keep it in. Hudibras.

2. The body of water so hemmed in. [Scotch.]

Dam (dam), v.t. pret. & pp. dammed; ppr. damming. [See the noun.] 1. To obstruct or restrain the flow of, by a dam; to confine by constructing a dam, as a stream of water: often used with in, up.—2. To confine or restrain; to shut up or in; to obstruct.

Abortive tears from their fair eyes out-flow'd,
And damm'd the lovely splendour of their sight. Cowley.

—To dam out, to prevent from entering, as water, by means of a dam.

Damage (dam'āj), n. [O.Fr. damage; Fr. dommage; Pr. damnatge, from damnaticum, a supposed form from L. damnum, loss, injury. Perhaps from the same root as in Skr. dambh, to hurt, injure, deceive; but see DAMN.] 1. Any hurt, injury, or harm to one's estate; any loss of property sustained; any hindrance to the increase of property; or any obstruction to the success of an enterprise; any injury to person, character, or reputation.

To the utmost of our ability we ought to repair any damage we have done. Beattie.

2. In law, the value in money of what is lost; the estimated money equivalent for detriment or injury sustained; that which is given or adjudged to repair a loss. In this sense the word is generally used in the plural. In common law it is the province of a jury to assess damages.—3. The cost of anything. [Colloq.]

Many thanks, but I must pay the damage, and will thank you to tell me the amount of the engraving. Byron.

Damage (dam'āj), v.t. pret. & pp. damaged; ppr. damaging. [See the noun.] To hurt or harm; to injure; to impair; to lessen the soundness, goodness, or value of.

He . . . came up to the English admiral and gave him a broadside, with which he killed many of his men and damaged the ship. Clarendon.

Damage (dam'āj), v.i. To receive harm; to be injured or impaired in soundness or value; as, green corn will damage in a mow or stack.

Damageable (dam'āj-a-bl), a. 1. That may be injured or impaired; susceptible of damage; as, damageable goods.—2. Hurtful; pernicious. [Rare.]

The other denied it, because it would be damageable and prejudicial to the Spaniard. Camden.

Damage-cleer (dam'āj-klēr), n. [L. damna clericorum.] In law, a fee formerly paid in the Courts of Common Pleas, King's Bench, and Exchequer, in certain cases where damages were recovered in these courts.

Damaged (dam'ājd), p. and a. Hurt; impaired; injured; as, damaged goods; a damaged reputation.

Damage-feasant (dam'āj-fāz-ant), a. [Fr. faisant, from faire, to do.] In law, doing injury; trespassing, as cattle: applied to a stranger's beasts found in another person's ground without his leave or license, and there doing damage, by feeding or otherwise, to the grass, corn, wood, &c. In this case the person damaged may distrain and impound them, as well by night as in the day.

Damajavag (dä-ma-jä'vag), n. The name given to a preparation of the chestnut-tree, employed as a substitute for oak bark and gall-nuts in tanning.

Dame's-violet, Dame-wort (dāmz'vī-ō-let, dām'wėrt), n. The popular names of Hesperis matronalis, nat. order Cruciferæ. It is an erect herb, with a perennial root; the stems, from 2 to 3 feet high, are few or solitary; and the leaves are serrate. Its flowers are pale, purplish, and sweet-scented, especially in the evening. It flowers in May and June, and grows in meadows and plantations, but is not a native of Britain, having merely escaped from cultivation.

Damianist (dā'mi-an-ist), n. Eccles. one of a sect founded by Damian, bishop of Alexandria, in the sixth century, who denied any distinction in the Godhead, yet using the names of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

Dammar (dam'mär), n. See DAMMARA.

Dammara (dam'mär-a), n. 1. A genus of trees, nat. order Coniferæ, from the other species of which they are distinguished by their large, lanceolated, leathery leaves, with numerous and nearly parallel veins, and by their seeds having a wing at one side instead of proceeding from the end. Dammara orientalis is a lofty tree, attaining on the mountains of Amboyna a height of from 80 to 100 feet. Its light timber is of little value, but it yields the well-known dammar-resin. Another species is D. australis, the kauri- or cowrie-pine (which see). D. Moorii, a tree 40 feet high, is found in New Caledonia. D. obtusa, a large timber tree used in ship-building, is a native of the New Hebrides.—2. Dammar-resin (which see).

Dammarin (dam'mär-in), n. See DAMMAR-RESIN.

Dammar-resin (dam'mär-re-zin), n. A gum or resin resembling copal, produced by various species of dammar. The East Indian or cat's-eye resin is got from the Dammara orientalis, and when mixed with powdered bamboo bark and a little chalk is used for caulking ships. Another variety, the cowrie or kauri gum, is obtained from the D. australis of New Zealand; it is colourless or pale yellow, hard and brittle, and has a faint odour and resinous taste. Both gums are used for colourless varnish, for which purpose they are dissolved in turpentine. Called also Dammara, Dammarin.

Damn (dam), v.t. [L. damno, to condemn, from damnum, damage, a fine, penalty. Pott derives it from root da, as in dare, to give.] 1. In theol. to sentence to eternal torments in a future state; to consign to punishment in hell; to procure or cause to be eternally condemned.

He that believeth not shall be damned. Mark xvi. 16.

That which he continues ignorant of, having done the utmost lying in his power that he might not be ignorant of it, shall not damn him. South.

To cause to strike suddenly and with violence; to strike or throw violently or suddenly; as, to dash one stone against another; to dash water on the face.

Lest thou dash thy foot against a stone. Mat. iv. 6.

A foot more light, a step more true,
Ne'er from the heath-flower dashed the dew.
Sir W. Scott.

2. To break by collision or striking; to shatter. 'A brave vessel dashed all to pieces.' Shak.—3. To overspread or bespatter; to sprinkle; as, to dash a garment. 'Life is dashed with flecks of sin.' Tennyson. [In this sense it strongly recalls Sc. tash, to stain or defile, from Fr. tache.]—4. To place in a somewhat hasty manner; as, to dash paint upon a picture.—5. To mix, reduce, or adulterate by throwing in another substance; as, to dash wine with water; the story is dashed with fables.—6. To disturb; to destroy; to frustrate. 'To perplex and dash maturest counsels.' Milton.

The truth is, if we consider that great multitude of things to be known, and the labour and time required to the knowledge of each particular; it is enough to discourage and dash all attempt, and cause a careless despair. South.

7. To confound; to confuse; to put to shame; to abash; as, he was dashed at the appearance of the judge.

Dash the proud gamester in his gilded car. Pope.

8. To suffuse; to overspread.

Dashed with blushes for her slighted love.
Addison.

—To dash off, to form or sketch out in haste carelessly; to execute hastily or with careless rapidity; as, to dash off an article for a magazine.—To dash out, to erase at a stroke; to strike out; to blot out or obliterate; as, to dash out a line or word.

Dash (dash), v.i. 1. To rush with violence; to move rapidly so as to make a loud sound when an opposing object is met.

All the long-pent stream of life
Dashed downward in a cataract. Tennyson.

2. To display rapidity in performance.

With just, bold lines he dashes here and there,
Showing great mastery with little care. Rochester.

Dash (dash), n. 1. Collision; a violent striking together of two bodies. 'The dash of clouds.' Thomson.—2. Infusion; admixture; something thrown into another substance; as, the wine has a dash of water. 'Innocence when it has in it a dash of folly.' Addison. 3. A sudden check; frustration; abashment; as, his hopes met with a dash.—4. A rapid movement; a quick stroke or blow; a sudden onset; as, to make a dash upon the enemy.—5. The capacity for unhesitating, prompt action, as against an enemy; vigour in attack; as, the corps was distinguished for dash.

Young Havelock has distinguished himself very much by his forwardness and dash. W. H. Russell.

6. A flourish; blustering parade; as, the young fop made a dash.—7. A mark or line [—] in writing or printing noting a break or stop in the sentence, or a pause, or a division of the sentence. Dashes are also used instead of parentheses.—8. In music, (a) a small mark, thus !, denoting that the note over which it is placed is to be performed in a short and distinct manner. (b) A line drawn through a figure in the thorough-bass, directing the note represented by that figure to be raised half a tone.

Dash-board (dash'bōrd), n. A board or leathern apron placed on the fore part of a chaise, gig, or other vehicle to prevent water, mud, &c., from being thrown upon those in the vehicle by the heels of the horses.

Dasher (dash'ér), n. 1. One who or that which dashes or agitates, as the float of a paddle-wheel, the plunger of a churn, and the like.—2. A dash-board (which see).—3. One who makes an ostentatious parade; a bold, showy, impetuous man or woman. [Low.]

Dashing (dash'ing), a. Impetuous; spirited; showy; brilliant; as, a dashing fellow; a dashing charge of cavalry.

'But the society is very good still, is it not?' 'Oh, very genteel,' said the man, 'but not so dashing as it used to be.' Lord Lytton.

Dashism (dash'izm), n. Brilliant courage; spiritedness; dash. [Rare.]

He must fight a duel before his claims to . . . dashism can be universally allowed. Knox.

Dashpot (dash'pot), n. In mach. an apparatus for deadening the blow of any falling weight, and preventing any jar in the machinery. It consists of a cylinder inclosing a loosely fitting piston called a plunger. The cylinder is filled with water to a certain height, and in this the plunger moves, rising and falling with the movement of the machinery.

Dash-wheel (dash'whēl), n. A name applied to two cylinders revolving against each other in a cistern, used for washing woven goods by alternately dipping them in the water and dashing them against the sides of the compartment in which they are placed.

Dastard (das'tèrd), n. [Probably of Scandinavian origin; comp. Icel. dæstr, exhausted (akin to daze), the termination being same as the ordinary suffix -ard, as in sluggard, wizard. Wedgwood derives it directly from daze, with suffix -ard.] A coward; a poltroon; one who meanly shrinks from danger. 'This dastard at the battle.' Shak.

Dastard (das'tèrd), a. Cowardly; meanly shrinking from danger.

Curse on their dastard souls. Addison.

Dastard (das'tèrd), v.t. To make dastardly; to intimidate; to dispirit. [Rare.]

Dastards manly souls with hope and fear. Dryden.

Dastardize (das'tèrd-īz), v.t. To make cowardly. 'To dastardize my courage.' Dryden. [Rare.]

Dastardness (das'tèrd-nes), n. Cowardliness; mean timorousness.

Dastardy (das'tèrd-i), n. Cowardliness; base timidity.

Dasycladeæ (da-si-kla'dē-ē), n. pl. [Gr. dasys, hairy, and klados, the young slip or shoot of a tree.] A small nat. order of green-spored algæ, which are either naked or coated with carbonate of lime, and have a one-celled simple or branched axis, whorled either throughout its whole length, or near the summit with jointed branchlets. Dasycladus, the typical genus, has threads free from any crust. There are no representatives of the order on our coasts.

Dasygastriæ (da-si-gas'tri-ē), n. pl. [Gr. dasys, hairy, and gastēr, gasteros, gastros, the belly.] In entom. a division and extensive group of the bee family, including those solitary bees which have a hirsute abdomen, on which they carry their food.

Dasymeter (da-sim'et-ér), n. [Gr. dasys, dense, and metron, measure.] An instrument employed for testing the density of a gas. See MANOMETER.

Dasyornis (da-si-or'nis), n. [Gr. dasys, hairy, and ornis, a bird.] Bristle-bird, a genus of insectivorous birds, belonging to the thrush family. They are found throughout the greater part of Southern Australia.

Dasypidæ (da-si'pi-dē), n. pl. [Gr. dasys, hairy, pous, a foot, and eidos, likeness.] A small but important family of edentate mammals, comprising the manis, the armadillo, the ant-eater, and the platypus or duck-bill.

Dasyprocta (da-si-prok'ta), n. [Gr. dasys, hairy, and proktos, buttocks.] A genus of rodents with long hair on the rump, commonly called agouti.

Dasypus (da'si-pus), n. [Gr. dasys, hairy, and pous, a foot.] The armadillo, a genus of mammiferous quadrupeds. See ARMADILLO.

Dasyure, Dasyurus (da'si-ūr, da-si-ūr'us), n. [Gr. dasys, hairy, and oura, a tail.] The brush-tailed opossums, a genus of plantigrade marsupials, found in Australia, and so named in contrast to the opossums of the New World (Didelphys), which have naked tails somewhat like rats. The ursine dasyure (Dasyurus ursinus) is about the size of a badger, but of a sturdier form, of a dull black colour, carnivorous, and of so savage a temper as to have gained for itself the alternative name of Diabolus ursinus, or Tasmanian devil. Formerly it was most destructive to flocks and poultry yards, but is now in the inhabited districts nearly extirpated. The various species of the genus have much the same nature and habits as the European polecat.

Dasyurinæ (da'si-ūr-ī''nē), n. pl. [Gr. dasys, hairy, and oura, a tail.] A sub-family of marsupial animals, of which the genus Dasyurus is the type. See DASYURE.

Dataria (da-tā'ri-a), n. [L.L., from datum, a date.] The papal office of the chancery at Rome, from which all bulls are issued.

Datary (dā'ta-ri), n. 1. An officer of the chancery of Rome, who affixes the datum Romæ (given at Rome) to the pope's bulls. 2. The employment of a datary.

Date (dāt), n. [Fr., from L. datum, given, which was prefixed in a Roman letter to particulars of the time and place of its execution.] 1. That addition to a writing which specifies the year, month, and day when, and usually the place where it was given or executed. In letters, it notes the time when they are written or sent; in deeds, contracts, wills, and other papers, it specifies the time of execution, and usually the time from which they are to take effect and operate on the rights of persons. To the date is usually added the name of the place where a writing is executed, and this is sometimes included in the term date.—2. The time when any event happened, when anything was transacted, or when anything is to be done; as, the date of a battle; the date of Cæsar's arrival in Britain.—3. End; conclusion. [Rare.]

What time would spare, from steel receives its date.
Pope.

4. Duration; continuance. 'Ages of endless date.' Milton.—5. The period of time during which one has lived or anything has existed; age.

When his date
Doubled her own, for want of playmates, he
Had tost his ball, and flown his kite, and roll'd
His hoop to pleasure Edith. Tennyson.

Date (dāt), v.t. pret. & pp. dated; ppr. dating. 1. To write or note the time when a letter is written or a writing executed; to express, in an instrument, the year, month, and day of its execution, and usually the place; as, to date a letter, a bond, a deed, or a charter.—2. To note or fix the time of, as of an event or transaction; as, to date the fulfilment of a prophecy.

Date (dāt), v.i. 1. To reckon.

We date from the late era of about six thousand years. Bentley.

2. To begin; to have origin.

3. To have a date; as, the letter dates from Rome. See DATE, n. 1.

Date (dāt), n. [Fr. datte, from L. dactylus, Gr. daktylos, a finger, a date.] The fruit of the date-tree, the Phœnix dactylifera, used extensively as an article of food by the natives of Northern Africa, and of some countries of Asia. It consists of an external pericarp, separable into three portions, and covering a seed which is hard and horny in consequence of the nature of the albumen in which the embryo plant is buried.

Dateless (dāt'les), a. Having no date; bearing nothing to show date; so old as to be beyond date; that cannot be dated; having no fixed term or limit; eternal.

Precious friends hid in death's dateless night. Shak.

The dateless hills, which it needed earthquakes to lift and deluges to mould. Ruskin.

Date-palm, Date-tree (dāt'pām, dāt'trē), n. The common name of Phœnix dactylifera, Date-palm (Phœnix dactylifera).

the palm-tree of Scripture. Next to the cocoa-nut tree, the date is unquestionably the most interesting and useful of the palm tribe. Its stem shoots up to the height of 50 or 60 feet, without branch or division, and of nearly the same thickness throughout its length. From the summit it throws out a magnificent crown of large feather-shaped leaves, and a number of spadices, each of which in the female plant bears a bunch of from 180 to 200 dates, each bunch weighing from 20 to 25 lbs. The fruit is eaten fresh or dried. Cakes of dates pounded and kneaded together are the food of the Arabs who traverse the deserts. A liquor resembling wine is made from dates by fermentation. Persia, Palestine, and the northern states of Africa are best adapted for the culture of the date-tree.

Date-plum (dāt'plum), n. The fruit of the Diospyros Lotus; as also the tree itself. See DIOSPYROS.

Dater (dāt'ėr), n. One that dates.

Date-sugar (dāt'shu-gėr), n. Sugar produced from the fruit of the date-palm, and from some other species of the same genus.

Datholite, n. See DATOLITE.

Datiscaceæ (da-tis-kā'sē-ē), n. pl. [Gr. datiska, a plant mentioned by Dioscorides.] A small nat. order of plants, with apetalous flowers, but having closer affinities with Cucurbitaceæ and Begoniaceæ than with any of the apetalous orders. The most common plant of this order is Datisca cannabina, an herbaceous diœcious perennial, a native of the southern parts of Europe, where it is used as a substitute for Peruvian bark, also as a yellow dye, and for forming cordage.

Datiscin, Datiscine (da-tis'sin), n. A substance having the appearance of grape-sugar, first extracted by Braconnot from the leaves of Datisca cannabina. It has been used as a yellow dye. ($C_{21}H_{22}O_{12}$.)

Dative (dā'tiv), a. [L. dativus, from do, to give.] 1. In gram. a term applied to the case of nouns which usually follows verbs or other parts of speech that express giving, or some act directed to the object, generally indicated in English by to or for. Thus, Latin datur tibi, it is given to you; missum est illi, it was sent to him; fecit mihi, he made or did to or for me; utilis tibi, useful to you.—2. In law, (a) that may be given or disposed of at pleasure; in one's gift. (b) Removable, in distinction from perpetual: said of an officer. (c) Given or appointed by a magistrate or court of justice, in distinction from what is given by law or by a testator; as, an executor dative in Scots law (=administrator).

Dative (dā'tiv), n. The dative case. See the adjective.

Datolite, Datholite (dat'ō-līt, dath'ō-līt), n. [Gr. dateomai, to divide, and lithos, a stone, from its tendency to divide into granular portions.] The siliceous borate of lime, a mineral of two sub-species, the common and the botryoidal. The common is of a white colour, of various shades, and greenish gray. It occurs in granular distinct concretions, and crystallized. The botryoidal occurs in mammillary concretions, or in botryoidal masses, white and earthy.

Datum (dā'tum), n. pl. Data (dā'ta). [L.] Something given or admitted; any condition, quantity, or other mathematical premiss, which is given in a particular problem. In general math. data are certain things or quantities supposed to be given or known, from which other quantities are discovered which were unknown or sought. In geom. datum and hypothesis are synonymous terms.—Datum line, in engin. the base line of a section from which all the heights and depths are measured in the plans of a railway, &c.

Datura (da-tū'ra), n. [From its Ar. name

Thorn-apple (Datura Stramonium).—1, Root. 2, Seed-vessel cut across.

tatorah.] A genus of solanaceous plants, with large funnel-shaped flowers. There are several species, all of them possessing poisonous properties and a disagreeable odour. D. Stramonium is the thorn-apple, all parts of which have strong narcotic properties. It is sometimes employed as a remedy for neuralgia, convulsions, &c., and the leaves and root are smoked for asthma.

Daturin (da-tū'rin), n. A poisonous alkaloid found in the thorn-apple. See DATURA.

Daub (dąb), v.t. [According to Wedgwood from dab, an imitation of the sound made by throwing down anything soft. Some derive it from the Celtic, referring it to the root of Ir. dob, to plaster, W. dwb, mortar, cement.] 1. To smear with soft adhesive matter; to plaster; to cover with mud, slime, or other soft substance.

She took for him an ark of bulrushes, and daubed it with slime and with pitch. Ex. ii. 3.

So will I break down the wall ye have daubed with untempered mortar. Ezek. xiii. 14.

2. To soil; to defile; to besmear.

Tim's honest, though daubed with the dust of the mill.
A. Cunningham.

3. To paint coarsely.

If a picture is daubed with many bright colours, the vulgar admire it. Watts.

4. To cover with something specious; to disguise with an artificial covering.

So smooth he daubed his vice with show of virtue.
Shak.

5. To lay or put on without taste; to deck awkwardly or ostentatiously, or to load with affected finery.

Yet since princes will have such things, it is better they should be graced with elegance than daubed with cost. Bacon.

Daub (dąb), v.i. To practise gross flattery; to play the hypocrite.

Conscience will not daub nor flatter. South.

Daub (dąb), n. 1. A coarse painting. 'A melancholy daub.' Sterne.—2. A viscous, adhesive application; a smear.

Dauber (dąb'ėr), n. One who or that which daubs; specifically, (a) a builder of walls with clay or mud mixed with straw. (b) A coarse painter. (c) A low and gross flatterer. (d) A copperplate-printers' tool, consisting of rags firmly tied together, and covered over with a piece of canvas, for inking plates.

Daubery, Daubry (dąb'ė-ri, dąb'ri), n. 1. A daubing.—2. Anything artful.

Daubing (dąb'ing), n. 1. Anything adhesive; plaster.—2. Coarse painting.

Such gross and dangerous daubings of black, red, and white, as wholly change the very natural looks.
Jer. Taylor.

3. Gross flattery. Bp. Burnet.

Daubry, n. See DAUBERY.

Dauby (dąb'i), a. Viscous; glutinous; slimy; adhesive. 'Dauby wax.' Dryden.

Daucus (dą'kus), n. A genus of umbelliferous plants, with spinous fruit of a somewhat compressed ovate or oblong form. There are several species, but the most interesting one is the D. Carota, which grows wild all over Europe, in chalky soils, and is believed to be the origin of our garden carrot.

Daud (dąd), v.t. [Apparently imitative. See DAUB.] To strike; to slap; to pelt with a soft substance. [Scotch.]

He'll clap a shangan on her tail,
An' set the bairns to daud her
Wi' dirt that day. Burns.

Daud, n. Same as Dawd (which see).

Daugh (dąch), n. [Contr. for dawache, as much land as can be tilled by eight oxen; Gael. dàimh, oxen, and ach, a field.] An old Scotch division of land, capable of producing 48 bolls. Professor Cosmo Innes says it consisted of two ploughgates of 104 acres each. It occasionally forms and enters into the names of farms in Scotland; as, the Great and Little Daugh of Ruthven; Edin-daugh. Written also Davach.

Daughter (dą'tėr), n. [A. Sax. dôhtor This word is common to nearly all the Indo-European languages. Comp. G. tochter, D. dochter, Gr. thygatēr, Per. doktarah, Skr. duhitri, Lith. duktė, Ir. dear—daughter.] 1. The female offspring of a man or woman; a female child of any age. 'Sea king's daughter as happy as fair.' Tennyson.—2. A daughter-in-law; a son's wife. Ruth iii. 18. 3. A woman.

Dinah went out to see the daughters of the land.
Gen. xxxiv. 1.

Dawk (dąk), n. [Hind. dāk, a post.] In the East Indies, the post; a relay of men, as for carrying letters, despatches, &c., or travellers in palanquins. The route is divided into stages, and each bearer or set of bearers serves only for a single stage. In some places there are horse-dawks or mounted runners.—Dawk-bungalow, a house at the end of a stage designed for those who journey by palanquin.—To travel dawk, to journey in palanquins carried by relays of men or by government post-waggons.

Dawm (dąm), n. An East Indian copper coin of the value of one-fortieth of a rupee.

Dawn (dąn), v.i. [A. Sax. dagian, to dawn or become day, from dæg, day. Dagian regularly produced daw, seen in O.E. and in Sc. daw, to dawn, but n was early introduced, hence O.E. dawnen, Mod. E. dawn.] 1. To begin to grow light in the morning; to grow light; as, the day dawns; the morning dawns.

It began to dawn toward the first day of the week. Mat. xxviii. 1.

Brightest and best of the sons of the morning!
Dawn on our darkness and lend us thine aid. Heber.

2. To begin to open or expand; to begin to show intellectual light or knowledge; as, the genius of the youth begins to dawn.

When life awakes and dawns at every line. Pope.

3. To begin to become visible in consequence of more light shining upon; to begin to open or appear; as, the truth dawns upon me.

I waited underneath the dawning hills. Tennyson.

Dawn (dąn), n. 1. The break of day; the first appearance of light in the morning.

Fairest of stars, last in the train of night,
If better thou belong not to the dawn. Milton.

2. First opening or expansion; beginning; rise; first appearance; as, the dawn of genius, of intellect, &c. 'The dawn of time.' Thomson.

Such as creation's dawn beheld thou rollest now. Byron.

Dawning (dąn'ing), n. 1. The first appearance of light in the morning.

But sorrow returned with the dawning of morn,
And the voice in my dreaming ear melted away. Campbell.

2. First opening or appearance, as of intellectual powers; beginning; as, the first dawning of notions in the understanding.

Moreover always in my mind I bear
A cry from out the dawning of my life. Tennyson.

Dawpate (dą'pāt), n. A simpleton.

Dawt (dat), v.t. [Akin E. dote.] To regard or treat with affection; to pet; to caress; to fondle. [Scotch.]

Much dawted by the gods is he,
Wha' to the Indian plain
Successfu' ploughs the wally sea,
And safe returns again. Ramsay.

Dawtie (dąt'i), n. A beloved child; a darling; a child much fondled through affection: frequently used as a term of endearment. [Scotch.]

Day (dā), n. [A. Sax. dæg. Cog. D. Dan. and Sw. dag, Icel. dagr, Goth. dags, G. tag; not connected with L. dies, a day.] 1. That part of the time of the earth's revolution on its axis in which its surface is presented to the sun; that space of time during which it continues to be light in contradistinction to night, or that portion of time during which it is dark; but the space of time in which it is light being somewhat vague and indeterminate, the time between the rising and setting of the sun is usually termed the day, and constitutes what astronomers call the artificial day. 'And God called the light day.' Gen. i. 5.—2. The whole time or period of one revolution of the earth on its axis, or twenty-four hours; called the natural day.

And the evening and the morning were the first day. Gen. i. 5.

In this sense the day may commence at any period of the revolution. The Babylonians began the day at sun-rising; the Jews at sun-setting; the Egyptians at midnight, as do several nations in modern times, the British, French, Spanish, American, &c. This day, in reference to civil transactions, is called the civil day. Thus with us the day when a legal instrument is dated begins and ends at midnight. In astron. a natural or solar day is usually considered to be the interval between the sun's leaving the meridian and his return to it. The length of this day is continually varying, owing to the eccentricity of the earth's orbit and the obliquity of the ecliptic. A mean solar day is a mean of all the natural or solar days in the year. A sidereal day is the time of one apparent revolution of the fixed stars. It is uniformly equal to 23 hours, 56 minutes, 4·098 seconds.—3. Light; sunshine.

Let us walk honestly as in the day. Rom. xiii. 13.

4. Time specified; any period of time distinguished from other time; age; time, with reference to the existence of a person or thing; as, he was a useful man in his day.

In the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die. Gen. ii. 17

In this sense the plural is often used; as, from the days of the judges; in the days of our fathers. In this sense also the word is often equivalent to life or earthly existence.

5. The contest of a day; battle; or day of combat; as, the day is our own.

His name struck fear, his conduct won the day. Roscommon.

6. An appointed or fixed time.

If my debtors do not keep their day. Dryden.

7. Time of commemorating an event; anniversary; the same day of the month in any future year; as, George Heriot's day; St. Bartholomew's day.—Day by day, daily; every day; each day in succession; continually; without intermission of a day.

Day by day we magnify thee. Book of Common Prayer.

From day to day, on successive days till the matter is concluded.—To-day, on the present day; this day; or at the present time.—One day, or one of these days, sometime hereafter; sooner or later. 'I hope one day to see you fitted with a husband.' Shak.—I have seen the day, a phrase implying that a person or circumstances were once different from what they are now.—Day of grace, (a) in theol. the time during which mercy is offered to sinners.

Life is the season God hath given
To fly from hell and rise to heaven;
That day of grace fleets fast away,
And none its rapid course can stay.
Scotch Scripture Paraphrase.

(b) pl. In old English law, days granted by the court for delay at the prayer of the plaintiff or defendant; three days beyond the day named in the writ, in which the person summoned might appear and answer. (c) pl. In com. a customary number of days, in Great Britain and America three, allowed for the payment of a promissory note or a bill of exchange (not drawn at sight or on demand) after it becomes due. Thus a bill falling due on the seventh of the month is payable on the tenth. The days of grace are different in different countries.—Day's journey, a somewhat loose mode of measuring distance in the East. The day's journey of a man on foot may be estimated at about 20 to 24 English miles, but if the journey is for many days, about 17½. A day's journey on horseback may be taken at about 26 to 30 miles. In a caravan journey with camels the day's journey is about 30 miles for a short distance, but on an extended line somewhat less. The mean rate of the daily marches of armies is about 14 miles in a line of from eight to ten marches; but for a single march, or even two or three, the distance may be a mile or two longer.—Day's work, (a) the work of one day. (b) Naut. the account or reckoning of a ship's course for twenty-four hours, from noon to noon.—Days in banc, in England, an old legal expression for certain days set down by statute or by order of a court, when writs should be returned, or a party who was summoned should appear on the writ served.—To name the day, to fix the day on which one is to be married.

Dazzle (daz'zl), v.t. pret. & pp. dazzled; ppr. dazzling. [Freq. of daze.] 1. To overpower with light; to hinder distinct vision by intense light; to dim, as the sight by excess of light.

Dark with excessive bright thy skirts appear,
Yet dazzle heaven, that brightest seraphim
Approach not but with both wings veil their eyes.
Milton.

2. Fig. to overpower or confound by splendour or brilliancy, or with show or display of any kind. 'Dazzled and drove back his enemies.' Shak.

Dazzle (daz'zl), v.i. 1. To be overpoweringly bright; as, the light dazzles.—2. Fig. to excite admiration by brilliancy, or any showy quality; as, her beauty dazzled rather than pleased.

Ah, friend! to dazzle let the vain design. Pope.

3. To be overpowered by light; to shake or be unsteady; to waver, as the sight.

I dare not trust these eyes;
They dance in mists, and dazzle with surprise.
Dryden.

De- (dē). A common prefix in English words, representing in most instances the Latin de, from, away from, down from, as, in debark, deduct, detract, decamp, descend, decline. In some cases it represents the Latin dis or di, coming through the Fr. dé, as in deluge, Fr. déluge, L. diluvium; delay, Fr. délai, L. dilatum. In certain cases it has an intensifying power or no apparent power at all; as in deprave, despoil, deny.

Deacon (dē'kon), n. [L. diaconus, from Gr. diakonos, a minister or servant—dia, by, and koneō, to serve.] 1. Eccles. a person in the lowest degree of holy orders. The office of deacon was instituted by the apostles, and seven persons were chosen at first to serve at the feasts of Christians, and distribute bread and wine to the communicants, and to minister to the wants of the poor. In the Roman Catholic Church the office of the deacon is to incense the officiating priest, to lay the corporale on the altar, to receive the cup from the sub-deacon and present it to the person officiating, to incense the choir, to receive the pax from the officiating prelate, and carry it to the sub-deacon, and at the pontifical mass to put the mitre on the bishop's head. In the Church of England the deacon is the lowest of the three orders of priesthood, these being bishops, priests, and deacons. The deacon may perform all the ordinary offices of the Christian priesthood except consecrating the elements at the administration of the Lord's Supper, and pronouncing the absolution. In Presbyterian churches the deacon's office is to attend to the secular interests, and in Independent churches it is the same, with the addition that he has to distribute the bread and wine to the communicants.—2. In Scotland, the president of an incorporated trade, who is the chairman of its meetings, and signs its records. Before the passing of the Burgh Reform Act the deacons of the crafts, or incorporated trades, in royal burghs, formed a constituent part of the town-council, and were understood to represent the trades as distinguished from the merchants and guild brethren; but by the terms of that act the deacons are no longer recognized as official and constituent members of the town council, but in other respects the rights and usages of the crafts are preserved, and are exercised without control on the part of the town council. The deacon-convener of the trades in Edinburgh and Glasgow still continues to be a constituent member of the town council.

Deacon, from Cloisters, Liége, 1460.

Deaconess (dē'kon-es), n. 1. A female deacon in the primitive church.—2. The term for a kind of quasi sister-of-mercy among certain Continental and other Protestants. Lee.

Dead-stand (ded'stand), n. 1. A dilemma; a fix.

I was at a dead-stand in the course of my fortunes, when it pleas'd God to provide me lately an employment to Spain. Howell.

2. A determined opposition; as, he made a dead-stand against that course.

Dead-thraw (ded'thrą), n. The death-throe; the last agony. [Scotch.]

Wha ever heard of a door being barred when a man was in the dead-thraw? How d'ye think the spirit was to get awa through bolts and bars like thae? Sir W. Scott.

Dead-wall (ded'wąl), n. A blank wall, without windows or openings.

Dead-water (ded'wą'tėr), n. Naut. the eddy water closing in with a ship's stern as she passes through the water.

Dead-weight (ded'wāt), n. 1. A heavy or oppressive burden.

The fact is, fine thoughts, enshrined in appropriate language, are dead-weights upon the stage, unless they are struck like sparks from the action of the fable. Cornhill Mag.

2. A name given to an advance by the Bank of England to the government on account of half-pay and pensions to retired officers of the army or navy.—3. Naut. the lading of a vessel when it consists of heavy goods; that portion of the cargo, as coals, iron, &c., which pays freight according to its weight, and not to its bulk.

Dead-well (ded'wel), n. Same as Absorbing Well. See ABSORBING.

Dead-wind (ded'wind), n. Naut. a wind right against the ship, or that blowing from the very point towards which she is sailing.

Dead-wood (ded'wụd), n. Naut. blocks of timber laid upon the keel of a ship, particularly at the extremities, afore and abaft, to a considerable height one above another, and into which the two half timbers are secured. They are fastened to the keel by strong spikes.

Dead-works (ded'wėrks), n. Naut. the parts of a ship which are above the surface of the water when she is balanced for a voyage.

Deaf (def), a. [A. Sax. deáf. Cog. D. doof, Dan. döv, Icel. daufr, G. taub—deaf. Connected with Sc. dowf, dull, dover, to slumber, daft, stupid, as also with Icel. dofi, torpor.] 1. Not perceiving sounds; not receiving impressions from sonorous bodies through the air; wanting the sense of hearing, either wholly or in part; as, a deaf ear; a deaf man.

Blind are their eyes, their ears are deaf,
Nor hear when mortals pray;
Mortals that wait for their relief
Are blind and deaf as they. Watts.

2. Not listening, or refusing to listen; not regarding; not moved, persuaded, or convinced; as, deaf to reason or arguments.

They might as well have blest her: she was deaf
To blessing or to cursing save from one. Tennyson.

3. Without the ability or will to regard spiritual things; unconcerned. 'Hear, ye deaf.' Is. xlii. 18.—4. Deprived of the power of hearing; deafened.

Deaf with the noise, I took my hasty flight. Dryden.

5. Stifled; imperfect; obscurely heard.

Nor silence is within, nor voice express,
But a deaf noise of sounds that never cease. Dryden.

6. Barren; blasted; as, a deaf nut; deaf corn.

Deaf† (def), v.t. To deafen. 'Deafed with clamours.' Shak.

Deaf-dumbness (def'dum-nes), n. Dumbness or aphony arising from deafness, congenital or occurring during infancy.

Deafen (def'n), v.t. 1. To make deaf; to deprive of the power of hearing; to impair the organs of hearing so as to render them unimpressible to sounds.—2. To stun; to render incapable of perceiving sounds distinctly; as, deafened with clamour or tumult.—3. In arch. to render impervious to sound (as a floor or partition) by means of sound-boarding and pugging.

Deafening (def'ning), n. In arch. the pugging used to prevent the passage of sound through floors, partitions, and the like.

Deafly (def'li), adv. Without sense of sounds; obscurely heard.

Deaf-mute (def'mūt), n. A person who is both deaf and dumb, the dumbness resulting from deafness which has either existed from birth or from a very early period of the person's life. Deaf-mutes communicate their thoughts by means of a manual alphabet. Under next article we give one of the forms of the two-hand alphabet invented about the close of the eighteenth century.

Deafness (def'nes), n. 1. Incapacity of perceiving sounds; the state of the organs which prevents the impressions which constitute hearing; want of the sense of hearing. Deafness occurs in every degree, from that which merely impairs the accuracy of the ear in distinguishing faint or similar sounds, to that state in which there is no more sensation produced by sounds in this organ than in any other part of the body. Dumbness is the usual concomitant of complete deafness, and in general dumbness does not proceed from any original defect in the organs of speech or from any mental incapacity, but from the want of the sense of hearing, which sense enables us to imitate articulate sounds and to acquire speech.—2. Unwillingness to hear; voluntary rejection of what is addressed to the ear and to the understanding.

Deaf-nut (def'nut), n. 1. A nut of which the kernel is decayed. Hence—2. Anything on which expectations have been founded that turns out worthless; as, his share of his uncle's estate turned out a deaf-nut after all.

Deal (dēl), v.t. pret. & pp. dealt; ppr. dealing. [A. Sax. dælan, to divide, Icel. deila, to part: from the noun. See DEAL, n.] 1. To divide; to part; to separate; hence, to divide in portions; to distribute, as cards to the players: often followed by out.

Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry? Is. lviii. 7.
And Rome deals out her blessings and her gold.
Tickel.

2. To scatter; to hurl; to throw about; as, to deal out blows.

Hissing through the skies, the feathery deaths were dealt. Dryden.

He continued, when worse days were come,
To deal about his sparkling eloquence. Wordsworth.

Deal (dēl), v.i. 1. To distribute; to divide; to share out in portions, as in card-playing. 2. To traffic; to trade; to negotiate.

They buy and sell, they deal and traffic. South.

3. To act between man and man; to intervene; to transact or negotiate between men.

He that deals between man and man raiseth his own credit with both. Bacon.

4. To behave well or ill; to act; to conduct one's self in relation to others.

Thou shalt not steal, nor deal falsely.
Lev. xix. 11.

—To deal by, to treat, either well or ill; as, to deal well by domestics.

Such one deals not fairly by his own mind. Locke.

—To deal in, (a) to have to do with; to be engaged in; to practise; as, they deal in political matters; they deal in low humour. (b) To trade in; as, to deal in silks or in cutlery.—To deal with, (a) to treat in any manner; to use well or ill.

Now will we deal worse with thee. Gen. xix. 9.
Return . . . and I will deal well with thee.
Gen. xxxii. 9.

(b) To contend with; to treat with, by way of opposition, check, or correction; as, he has turbulent passions to deal with. (c) Eccles. to treat with by way of discipline; to admonish. [Scotch.]

Deal (dēl), n. [O.E. deel, del, A. Sax. dæl, a portion, a share; the Teut. forms are all very similar, as D. deel, a share, a portion, a board or plank; Dan. deel, Sw. del, Goth.

dails, G. theil, a part, a share. Dole, dale are from the same root.] 1. Lit. a division; a part or portion; hence, an indefinite quantity, degree, or extent; as, a deal of time and trouble; a deal of cold; a deal of space. Formerly it was limited by some; as, some deal; but this is now obsolete or vulgar. In general, we now qualify the word with great; as, a great deal of labour; a great deal of time and pains; a great deal of land. In such phrases as, It is a great deal better, or worse, the words great deal serve as modifiers of the sense of better and worse. The true construction is, It is better by a great deal—that is, by a great part or difference. 2. The division or distribution of cards; the act or practice of dealing cards. 'The deal, the shuffle, and the cut.' Swift.—3. The division of a piece of timber made by sawing; a board or plank. The name deal is chiefly applied to boards of fir above 7 inches in width and of various lengths exceeding 6 feet. If 7 inches or less wide they are called battens, and when under 6 feet long they are called deal-ends. The usual thickness is 3 inches, and width 9 inches. The standard size, to which other sizes may be reduced, is 1¼ inch thick, 11 inches broad, and 12 feet long. Deals are imported from Prussia, Sweden, Norway, Russia, and British North America.—Whole deal, deal which is 1¼ inch thick; slit deal, half that thickness. 4. Wood of fir or pine, such as deals are made from; as, a floor of deal.

Dealbate † (dē-al'bāt), v.t. [L. dealbo, dealbatum, to whitewash—de, intens., and albus, white.] To whiten.

Dealbate (dē-al'bāt), a. In bot. covered with a very white opaque powder.

Dealbation † (dē-al-bā'shon), n. The act of bleaching; a whitening. Sir T. Browne.

Dealer (dēl'ėr), n. 1. One who deals; one who has to do or has concern with others; specifically, a trader; a trafficker; a shopkeeper; a broker; a merchant; as, a dealer in dry goods; a dealer in hardware; a dealer in stocks; a dealer in leather; a dealer in lumber; a dealer in linens or woollens; a small dealer in groceries; a money-dealer. 'These small dealers in wit and learning?' Swift.—2. One who distributes cards to the players.

Deal-fish (dēl'fish), n. [From its resemblance to a board.] Trachypterus (Bogmarus) arcticus, a fish occasionally found on the coasts of Orkney and Shetland.

Dealing (dēl'ing), n. 1. Practice; action; conduct; behaviour.

> Concerning the dealings of men, who administer government . . . they have their judge who sitteth in heaven. Hooker.

2. Conduct in relation to others; treatment; as, the dealings of a father with his children; God's dealings with men.

> It is to be wished, that men would promote the happiness of one another, in all their private dealings, among those who lie within their influence. Addison.

3. Intercourse in buying and selling; traffic; business; negotiation; as, Liverpool merchants have extensive dealings with all the world.—4. Intercourse of business or friendship; concern.

> The Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans. Jn. iv. 9.

Deal-tree (dēl'trē), n. The fir-tree, so called because deals are commonly made from it.

Deal-wine (dēl'win), n. Same as Dele-wine.

Deambulate † (dē-am'bū-lāt), v.i. [L. deambulo, to walk about—de, from, and ambulo, to walk.] To walk abroad.

Deambulation † (dē-am'bū-lā"shon), n. The act of walking abroad.

Deambulatory † (dē-am'bū-lā-to-ri), a. Pertaining to walks.

Deambulatory † (dē-am'bū-lā-to-ri), n. A covered place to walk in; specifically, the aisles of a church, or the porticoes around the body of a church; a gallery for walking in in a cloister, monastery, and the like. Warton.

Dean (dēn), n. [O.Fr. dean, deien, Mod. Fr. doyen, from L. decanus, one set over ten persons; in Med. L., one set over ten monks, from L. decem, ten.] 1. An ecclesiastical governor or dignitary, said to have been so called because he presided over ten canons or prebendaries; but more probably because each diocese was divided into deaneries, each comprising ten parishes or churches, and with a dean presiding over each. In England, in respect of their differences of office, deans are of six kinds: (a) Deans of chapters, who are governors over the canons in cathedral and collegiate churches. (b) Deans of peculiars, who have sometimes both jurisdiction and cure of souls, and sometimes jurisdiction only. Of the former class is the dean of Battle, in Sussex; of the latter are the deans of the Arches in London, of Bocking, in Essex, and of Croydon, in Surrey. (c) Rural deans, who were originally beneficed clergymen appointed by the bishop to exercise a certain jurisdiction in districts of his diocese remote from his personal superintendence. Their functions, however, have for many years become almost obsolete. (d) Deans in the colleges of Oxford and Cambridge, officers who superintend the behaviour of the students and enforce discipline. (e) Honorary deans, as the dean of the Chapel Royal, St. James's. (f) Dean of the province of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, to whom, when a convocation is to be assembled, the archbishop sends his mandate for summoning the bishops of the province.—Dean and chapter are the bishop's council to aid him with their advice in affairs of religion, and they may advise, likewise, in the temporal concerns of his see.—Dean of the chapel royal, in Scotland, a title bestowed on six clergymen of the Church of Scotland, who receive from the crown a portion of the revenues which formerly belonged to the chapel royal in Scotland, and which are now in the gift of the crown.—2. In some universities, as that of London and those of Scotland, the chief or head of a faculty; in the United States, a registrar or secretary of the faculty in a department of a college, as in a medical, theological, or scientific department.—3. The president for the time being of an incorporation of barristers or law practitioners; specifically, the president of the incorporation of advocates in Edinburgh.—Dean of guild, in Scotland, originally that magistrate of a royal burgh who was head of the merchant company or guildry; now the magistrate whose proper duty is to take care that all buildings within the burgh are sufficient, that they are erected agreeably to law, and that they do not encroach either on private or public property. He may order insufficient buildings to be taken down, but in other respects his jurisdiction is confined to possessory questions. In most burghs the functions of this officer are now performed by a member of the town-council, elected by the majority of councillors. But the deans of guild in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, and Perth, elected as heretofore by the guildry, are continued as constituent members of the council to perform all the functions of their office.—Dean of guild court, a court presided over by the dean of guild, and whose jurisdiction is confined to the regulation of buildings, to such matters of police as have any connection with buildings in the Scottish burghs.

Dean (dēn), n. A dene or valley.

Deanery (dēn'ė-ri), n. 1. The office or the revenue of a dean.—2. The house of a dean.

> Take her by the hand, away with her to the deanery, and dispatch it quickly. Shak.

3. The jurisdiction of a dean.

> Each archdeaconry is divided into rural deaneries, and each deanery is divided into parishes. Blackstone.

Deanship (dēn'ship), n. The office, rank, dignity, or title of a dean.

> Because I don't value your deanship a straw. Swift.

Dear (dēr), a. [A. Sax. deóre, dȳre, dear, beloved, high-priced; O.D. dier, Mod. D. duur, Icel. Dan. and Sw. dyr, G. theuer, dear, beloved, high-priced, &c.] 1. Bearing a high price in comparison with the usual price or the real value; of a higher price than customary, or high-priced in comparison with other articles: opposite to cheap (which see).

> The cheapest of us is ten groats too dear. Shak.

2. Characterized by scarcity or dearth, and hence by exorbitance of price; as, a dear season.—3. Of a high value in estimation; greatly valued; beloved; precious.

> And the last joy was dearer than the rest. Pope.
> Be ye followers of God, as dear children. Eph. v. 1.

From the notion of being highly valued comes that of being vitally essential.

> We will drain our dearest veins,
> But they shall be free. Burns.

From this the sense easily passes into that of worthy of high consideration, important, either in a good or bad sense; thus, 'dear cause,' in Lear iv. 3, equal to important business; so that, when applied to danger, a foe, pain, &c., it is almost equivalent to dangerous, deadly, bitter, &c.; as, 'our dear peril.' Shak.

> Would I had met my dearest foe in heaven,
> Ere I had seen that day. Shak.

In the following extracts it appears to signify closely affecting the heart; coming from the heart; earnest; passionate; and hence, furious. 'So dear the love my people bore me.' Shak. 'Deafed with the clamours of their own dear groans.' Shak.

> Consort with me in loud and dear petition. Shak.
> What foolish boldness brought thee to their mercies,
> Whom thou in terms so bloody, and so dear,
> Hast made thine enemies. Shak.

Dear† (dēr), v.t. To make dear. Shelton.

Dear (dēr), n. A darling; a word denoting tender affection or endearment.

> That kiss I carried from thee, dear. Shak.

Dear (dēr), adv. 1. Dearly; very tenderly. 'So dear I love the man.' Shak.—2. At a dear rate.

> If thou attempt it, it will cost thee dear. Shak.

Dearborn (dēr'born), n. A light four-wheeled country vehicle used in the United States: so called from its inventor.

Dear-bought (dēr'bąt), a. [See BOUGHT.] Purchased at a high price; as, dear-bought experience. 'Dear-bought blessings.' Dryden.

Deare† (dēr), n. [See DERE.] Hurt; trouble or misfortune. Spenser.

Dearling† (dēr'ling), n. Same as Darling. Spenser.

Dearly (dēr'li), adv. 1. At a high price.

> He buys his mistress dearly with his throne. Dryden.

2. With great fondness; as, we love our children dearly; dearly beloved.—3. † Exquisitely; richly. 'Dearly parted'=Richly gifted. Shak.

Dearn (dērn), n. In arch. a door-post or threshold. Written also Dern.

Dearn† (dern), a. [A. Sax. dierne, hidden, secret.] Lonely; solitary; melancholy.

Dearness (dēr'nes), n. 1. Scarcity; high price, or a higher price than the customary one; 'The dearness of corn.' Swift.—2. Fondness; nearness to the heart or affections; great value in estimation; preciousness; tender love. 'The dearness of friendship.' Bacon.

> The child too clothes the father with a dearness not his due. Tennyson.

Dearnful† (dērn'fųl), a. Same as Dernful.

Dearnly† (dērn'li), adv. Secretly; privately; mournfully. See DERNLY.

Dearth (dėrth), n. [See DEAR.] 1. Scarcity, which makes food dear; as, a dearth of corn.

2. Want; need; famine.

> Pity the dearth that I have pined in,
> By longing for that food so long a time Shak.

3. Barrenness; poverty; meagreness.

> That dearth of plot and narrowness of imagination which may be observed in all their plays. Dryden.

Dearthful (dėrth'fųl), a. Expensive; costly; very dear. [Scotch.]

> Ye Scots, wha wish auld Scotland well,
> It sets you ill,
> Wi' bitter dearthfu' wines to mell. Burns.

Dearticulate† (dē-är-tik'ū-lāt), v.t. [L. de, priv., and articulo, to joint, articulus, a joint.] To disjoint.

Deary (dēr'i), n. A word of endearment; a dear. [Familiar.]

Deas (dē'as), n. Same as Dais.

Deasil (dē'shēl), n. [Gael.] Motion from east to west, according to the course of the sun. Variously spelled Deasoil, Deisheal. [Scotch.]

Death (deth), n. [A. Sax. deáth. Cog. Goth. dauthus, L.G. and D. dood, Sw. and Dan. död, G. tod—death. See DEAD and DIE.] 1. That state of a being, animal or vegetable, but more particularly of an animal, in which there is a total and permanent cessation of all the vital functions, when the organs have not only ceased to act, but have lost the susceptibility of renewed action. Thus the cessation of respiration and circulation in an animal may not be death, for during hybernation some animals become entirely torpid, and the vital functions of some animals and vegetables may be suspended by frost, but being capable of revived activity they are not dead.

> Save those of fear, no other bands fear I,
> No other death than this—the fear to die. Crawshaw.

In poetry and poetical prose death is often personified and addressed or spoken of as if an individual.

> O death, where is thy sting? 1 Cor. xv. 55.
> How wonderful is Death!
> Death and his brother Sleep. Shelley.

Love paced the thymy plots of Paradise,
And all about him roll'd his lustrous eyes;
When, turning round a cassia, full in view,
Death, walking all alone beneath a yew,
And talking to himself, first met his sight. Tennyson.

2. The state of the dead. 'The gates of death.' Job xxxviii. 17.—3. The manner of dying.

Thou shalt die the deaths of them that are slain in the midst of the seas. Ezek. xxviii. 8.

Let me die the death of the righteous. Num. xxiii. 10.

4. A skeleton, or the figure of a skeleton, as the symbol of mortality; as, a death's head. 'Strains that might create a soul under the ribs of death.' Milton.—5. The act of taking life unlawfully; murder. 'Not to suffer a man of death to live.' Bacon.—6. Cause, agent, or instrument of death. 'Swiftly flies the feathered death.' Dryden.

It was one who should be the death of both his parents. Milton.

Deaths invisible come winged with fire. Dryden.

O thou man of God, there is death in the pot. 2 Ki. iv. 40.

7. Total loss or privation; extinction; as, the death of memory; the death of the year. 8. Imminent peril of death. 'In deaths oft.' 2 Cor. xi. 23.—9. Punishment of death; capital punishment.

I would make it death
For any male thing but to peep at us. Tennyson.

10. In theol. perpetual separation from God, and eternal torments; called the second death. Rev. ii. 11.—11. Separation or alienation of the soul from God; a being under the dominion of sin, and destitute of grace or divine life; state of being spiritually dead.

We know that we have passed from death to life, because we love the brethren. 1 John iii. 14.

12. Anything dreadful as death.

It was death to them to think of entertaining such doctrines. Atterbury.

—Civil death, is the separation of a man from civil society, or from the enjoyment of civil rights, as by banishment, abjuration of the realm, entering into a monastery, &c.

Death-agony (deth'ag-ō-ni), n. Death-struggle; the agony or struggle which immediately precedes death.

The sea, too near, decides us from the rest.
Fuller.

2. To bring to an end; to determine, as a question, controversy, or struggle, by some recognized mode of arbitrament; to settle by giving the victory to one side or the other; to determine the issue or result of; to conclude; to end; as, the court decided the case in favour of the plaintiff; the reserve decided the contest; the fate of the bill is decided.

The quarrel toucheth none but us alone;
Betwixt ourselves let us decide it then. Shak.

Decide (dē-sīd'), v. i. To determine; to form a definite opinion; to come to a conclusion; to pronounce a judgment; as, the court decided in favour of the defendant.

Who shall decide when doctors disagree? Pope.

Decided (dē-sīd'ed), a. 1. Well marked; clear; unequivocal; that puts an end to doubt; free from ambiguity or uncertainty; unmistakable; unquestionable; as, a decided improvement. 'A decided taste for science.' Prescott.

I find much cause to reproach myself that I have lived so long, and have given no decided and public proofs of my being a Christian.
P. Henry, Wirt's Sketches.

He had marked preferences, and . . . his opinions were as decided as his prejudices. Edin. Rev.

2. Resolute; determined; free from hesitation or wavering; as, a decided character.

Decidedly (dē-sīd'ed-li), adv. In a decided or determined manner; clearly; indisputably; in a manner to preclude doubt.

Decidence† (dē-sīd'ens or des'i-dens), n. [L. decidens, decidentis, ppr. of decido, to fall off —de, off, and cado, to fall.] A falling off.

Decider (dē-sīd'ėr), n. One who decides; one who determines a cause or contest.

Decidingly (dē-sīd'ing-li), adv. In a deciding manner; decidedly. Browne.

Decidua (dē-sid'ū-a), n. [For decidua membrana, the membrane that falls off. See DECIDUOUS.] In physiol. a membrane arising from alteration of the upper layer of the mucous membrane of the uterus, after the reception into the latter of the impregnated ovum, the name being given to it because it is discharged at parturition. At an early stage of the development of the human ovum the decidua exhibits a threefold division, the layer immediately lining the uterine cavity being called the decidua vera (true decidua), the second layer or that immediately investing the embryo being called the decidua reflexa (turned-back decidua), while a third layer, or rather a special development of part of the decidua vera, is called the decidua serotina (late decidua).

Deciduate (dē-sid'ū-āt), a. A term applied to those mammals, as Man, the Quadrumana, Carnivora, Insectivora, Cheiroptera, and Rodentia, which throw off a decidua after parturition; or to the placenta of such animals.

Deciduity (dē-sid-ū'i-ti), n. Deciduousness. Keith. [Rare.]

Deciduous (dē-sid'ū-us), a. [L. deciduus, decido—de, and cado, to fall.] Falling; not perennial or permanent; specifically, (a) in bot. applied both to trees whose leaves fall in autumn and to the leaves or other parts of the plant which do so fall; thus a deciduous calyx is one which falls along with the corolla and stamens: opposed to permanent. (b) In zool. applied to parts which fall off at a certain stage of an animal's existence, as the hair, horns, and teeth of certain animals.

Deciduousness (de-sid'ū-us-nes), n. The quality of falling once a year.

Decigram (de'si-gram), n. The anglicized form of décigramme (which see).

Décigramme (dā-si-gram'), n. A French weight of one-tenth of a gramme.

Decil, Decile (dē'sil), n. [Fr., from L. decem, ten.] An aspect or position of two planets when they are a tenth part of the zodiac distant from each other.

Décilitre (dā-si-lē-tr'), n. A French measure of capacity equal to one-tenth of a litre.

Decillion (dē-sil'li-on), n. A number involved to the tenth power; specifically, according to English notation, a million involved to the tenth power, or a unit with sixty ciphers annexed; according to the French notation, a thousand involved to the eleventh power, or a unit with thirty-three ciphers annexed.

Decillionth (dē-sil'li-onth), a. Pertaining to a decillion; having the magnitude or position of one of a decillion equal parts.

Decillionth (dē-sil'li-onth), n. The quotient of unity divided by a decillion; one of a decillion equal parts.

Decima, Decimi (de'si-ma, de'si-mī), n. In music, an interval of ten diatonic degrees, as from C to E, or third above the octave.

Decimal (de'si-mal), a. [Fr., from L. decimus, tenth, from decem, ten.] Of or pertaining to decimals; numbered or proceeding by decimals; having a tenfold increase or decrease; as, decimal notation; a decimal coinage.—Decimal arithmetic, in a general sense, denotes the common system of arithmetic, in which the decimal or denary scale of numbers is used, or in which the places of the figures change their value in a tenfold proportion, the value being ten times greater for every place more towards the left hand, and ten times less for every place more towards the right. In a more restricted sense, however, the term is applied to decimal fractions.—Decimal fraction, a fraction whose denominator is 10, or some number produced by the continued multiplication of 10 as a factor, such as 100, 1000, &c. In the notation of decimals the denominator is usually omitted, and to indicate its value a point is placed to the left of as many figures of the numerator as there are ciphers in the denominator. Should there not be a sufficient number of figures in the numerator, as many ciphers are prefixed as supply the deficiency. Thus $\frac{7}{10}$, $\frac{9}{100}$, $\frac{3}{1000}$, $\frac{75}{100}$, or $4\frac{75}{100}$ are decimals, and are usually written ·7, ·09, ·003, ·75, 4·75. From the notation of decimals it is evident that the figure immediately following the decimal point denotes tenths, the next figure hundredths, the third thousandths, &c. Hence, the values of figures in decimals, as well as in whole numbers, are increased in a tenfold ratio by removing them one place towards the left hand, and diminished in the same ratio by removing them one place to the right; and hence, also, all operations in decimals are performed in exactly the same manner as those in whole numbers, due attention being paid to the position of the separating point.—Decimal measure, a measure the unit of which is divided into ten equal parts.—Decimal system, see METRIC, 3.

Decimal (de'si-mal), n. Any number expressed in the scale of tens; specifically, and almost exclusively, a decimal fraction. See under the adjective.

Decimalism (de'si-mal-izm), n. The theory or system of a decimal currency, of decimal weights, measures, &c.

Decimalization (de'si-mal-iz-ā''shon), n. The act of reducing or causing to conform to the decimal system.

Decimalize (de'si-mal-īz), v. t. To reduce to the decimal system; as, to decimalize currency, weights, measures, &c.

Decimally (de'si-mal-li), adv. By tens; by means of decimals.

Decimate (de'si-māt), v. t. pret. & pp. decimated; ppr. decimating. [L. decimo, decimatum, to select by lot every tenth man for punishment, from decem, ten.] 1. To tithe; to take the tenth part of.—2. To select by lot and punish with death every tenth man of; as, to decimate an army or a collection of prisoners.—3. To destroy a great but indefinite number of; as, the inhabitants were decimated by fever; the troops were decimated by the enemy's fire: this last is now the usual meaning of the word.

It (England) had decimated itself for a question which involved no principle, and led to no result. Froude.

Decimation (de-si-mā'shon), n. 1.† A tithing.—2. A selection of every tenth by lot, as for punishment, &c.

By decimation and a tithed death
Take thou the destined tenth. Shak.

3. The destruction of a great but indefinite proportion of people, as of an army or inhabitants of a country; a heavy loss of life.

Decimator (de'si-māt-ėr), n. One who or that which decimates.

Décimètre (dā'si-mā-tr), n. A French measure of length equal to the tenth part of a metre, or 3·93710 inches.

Decimole (des'i-mōl), n. In music, a group of ten notes, marked '10' over the top, and played in the time of eight or four.

Decimo-sexto (de'si-mō-seks"tō), n. [L.] The size of one fold of a sheet of printing paper when doubled so as to make sixteen leaves: said of a sheet of paper or of a book. Written usually 16mo.

Decipher (dē-sī'fėr), v.t. [Fr. déchiffrer, to decipher—de, and chiffre, a cipher. See CIPHER.] 1. To explain what is written in ciphers, by finding what letter each character or mark represents; as, to decipher a letter written in secret characters.

Zelmane, that had the character in her heart, could easily decipher it. Sir P. Sidney.

2. To read what is written in obscure, partially obliterated, or badly formed characters.—3. To discover or explain the meaning of, as of something that is obscure or difficult to be understood. 'To decipher an ambiguous speech.' Johnson.—4. To describe or delineate. [Rare in this sense.]

Could I give you a lively representation of guilt and horror on this hand, and paint out eternal wrath and decipher eternal vengeance on the other, then might I show you the condition of a sinner hearing himself denied by Christ. South.

5.† To find out; to detect; to discover; to reveal.

What's the news?—
That you are both deciphered, that's the news,
For villains marked by rape. Shak.

What needs either your 'mum' or her 'budget?'
the white will decipher her well enough. Shak.

Decipherable (dē-sī'fėr-a-bl), a. That may be deciphered or interpreted.

Decipherer (dē-sī'fėr-ėr), n. One who explains what is written in ciphers or written obscurely.

Decipherment (dē-sī'fėr-ment), n. Act of deciphering. [Rare.]

Decision (dē-si'zhon), n. [L. decisio, decisionis, a cutting off, a decision. See DECIDE.] 1.† Act of separation or cutting off; detachment of a part; division. Bp. Pearson.—2. Determination, as of a question or doubt; final judgment or opinion in a case which has been under deliberation or discussion; as, the decision of the Supreme Court; he has considered the circumstances of the case and come to a decision.

Her full and earnest eye
Over her snow-cold breast and angry cheek
Kept watch, waiting decision. Tennyson.

3. Determination, as of a contest or event; end, as of a struggle; arbitrament; as, the decision of a battle by arms.

Their arms are to the last decision bent,
And fortune labours with the vast intent. Dryden.

4. Report of the opinions and determinations of any tribunal; as, read the decisions of the Court of King's Bench, of the Court of Session, &c.—5. The quality of being decided; unwavering firmness; prompt and fixed determination; as, a man of decision.—Decision, Determination, Resolution. Each of these words has two meanings,—the one being the act of deciding, determining, resolving; the other implying a habit of mind. It is in the latter use that the words are here compared. Decision, the quality of making up one's mind promptly and clearly upon any disputed or difficult point; determination, the settling upon some line of action with a fixed purpose to stick to it: it may often be nearly allied to stubbornness; resolution, the mental habit of following out with constancy any course the mind has fixed upon.

Martin Luther was equally distinguished for his prompt decision, his steadfast determination, and his inflexible resolution. Goodrich.

Decisive (dē-sī'siv), a. 1. Having the power or quality of determining a question, doubt, contest, event, &c.; final; conclusive; putting an end to controversy; as, the opinion of the court is decisive of the question; the victory was decisive.—2. Marked by decision or prompt determination.

A noble instance of this attribute of the decisive character. J. Foster.

Decisively (dē-sī'siv-li), adv. In a conclusive manner; in a manner to end deliberation, controversy, doubt, or contest.

Decisiveness (dē-sī'siv-nes), n. 1. The quality of ending doubt, controversy, and the like; conclusiveness.—2. The state of being marked by decision or prompt determination; as, decisiveness of character.

Decisory (dē-sī'so-ri), a. Able to decide or determine.

Decivilize (dē-siv'il-īz), v.t. To reduce from a civilized to a wild or savage state. Blackwood's Mag.

Deck (dek), v.t. [Same word as D. dekken, Dan. dække, G. decken, to cover, with the nouns, D. dek, Dan. dæk, a cover, a ship's deck, G. decke, a cover, deck, a deck; closely akin to E. thatch (Sc. thack), the root being that of L. tego, to cover. See THATCH.] 1.† To cover; to overspread; to put on. Milton.—2. To clothe; to dress the person; but usually, to clothe with more than ordinary elegance; to array; to adorn; to embellish.

The dew with spangles decked the ground. Dryden.

When, with new force, she aids her conquering eyes,
And beauty decks, with all that beauty buys.
Crabbe.

3. To furnish with a deck, as a vessel.

Deck (dek), n. [See the verb.] A horizontal platform or floor extending from side to side of a ship, and formed of planking, supported by the beams. In old warships of large size there were three tiers of decks: (a) the lower gun-deck, the first deck in first and second rate ships; (b) the middle deck, the second deck between the lower and upper decks; (c) the upper or main deck, the third deck which sustains the third tier of guns.—Quarter-deck, that above the upper deck, reaching forward from the stern to the gangway.—Gun-deck, in frigates, sloops of war, gun-brigs, and cutters, the main or upper deck, on which the guns are placed in battery.—Half-deck, the under part of the quarter-deck of a ship of war, contained between the foremost bulk-head of the cabin or ward-room and the break of the quarter-deck.—Spar-deck, that which is continued in a straight line from the quarter-deck to the forecastle in frigates and men-of-war converted into troop ships.—Flush-deck, a continued floor from stem to stern on one line.—In a first-rate ship of war of the old type the decks below the main or upper deck are successively called the middle-deck, gun-deck, and orlop-deck.—To clear the decks, to prepare a ship for action.

Deck (dek), a. 1. Fit to form the deck of a vessel; as, deck planking.—2. Belonging to the deck; confined to the deck; as, a deck passenger.

Declaration (de-kla-rā'shon), n. [L. declaratio.] 1. The act of declaring, making known, or announcing; affirmation; explicit assertion; open expression; avowal; verbal utterance; publication; proclamation; as, he declared his sentiments, and I rely on his declaration. 'The declaration of the greatness of Mordecai.' Est. x. 2.—2. That which is proclaimed or declared; specifically, the document or instrument by which an announcement is authoritatively made.

In 1776 the Americans laid before Europe that noble Declaration, which ought to be hung up in the nursery of every king and blazoned on the porch of every royal palace. Buckle.

3. In law, (a) that part of the process or pleadings in which the plaintiff sets forth at large his cause of complaint; the narration or count: in the criminal law of Scotland, the account taken down in writing which a prisoner who has been apprehended on suspicion of having committed a crime gives of himself on his examination. Judicial declaration, in civil causes, the statements taken down in writing of the parties when judicially examined as to the particular facts on which the case rests. (b) A simple affirmation substituted in lieu of an oath, solemn affirmation, or affidavit, which the law allows in a variety of cases, such as those which relate to the revenues of customs or excise, the post-office, and other departments of administration. Justices of the peace, notaries, &c., are also empowered in various cases to take voluntary declarations in lieu of oaths, solemn affirmations, and affidavits.—6.† Explanation. Chaucer. —Declaration of rights, see under RIGHT and BILL.

Declarative (dē-klar'a-tiv), a. Making declaration, proclamation, or publication; explanatory; making show or manifestation; assertive; declaratory.

The names of things should always be taken from something observably declarative of their form or nature. Grew.

Declaratively (dē-klar'a-tiv-li), adv. In a declarative manner; by distinct assertion, and not impliedly.

The priest shall expiate it, that is, declaratively. Bates.

Declarator (dē-klar'a-tėr), n. In Scots law, a declaratory action; a form of action in the Court of Session, the object of which is to have a fact declared judicially, leaving the legal consequences of it to follow as a matter of course; as, a declarator of marriage, of bastardy, &c.

Declaratorily (dē-kla'ra-to-ri-li), adv. By declaration or exhibition.

Declaratory (dē-kla'ra-to-ri), a. Making declaration, clear manifestation, or exhibition; expressive; as, this clause is declaratory of the will of the legislature.—Declaratory act, an act or statute which sets forth more clearly and explains the intention of the legislature in a former act.—Declaratory action, in Scots law, same as Declarator (which see).

Declare (dē-klār'), v.t. pret. & pp. declared; ppr. declaring. [L. declaro, to declare—de, intens., and claro, to make clear, from clarus, clear. See CLEAR.] 1.† To clear; to free from obscurity; to make plain. 'To declare this a little.' Boyle.—2. To make known by words; to tell explicitly; to manifest or communicate plainly in any way; to exhibit; to publish; to proclaim.

I will declare what he hath done for my soul. Ps. lxvi. 16.

The heavens declare the glory of God. Ps. xix. 1.

3. To assert; to affirm; as, he declares the story to be false.—4. To make a full statement of, as of goods on which duty falls to be paid to the custom-house.

A merchant of that guild cannot declare at the custom-house merchandise brought in one ship-load or land-conveyance of higher value than £2000. Brougham.

—To declare one's self, to throw off reserve and avow one's opinion; to show openly what one thinks, or which side he espouses.

We are a considerable body, who, upon a proper occasion, would not fail to declare ourselves. Addison.

Declare (dē-klār'), v.i. 1. To make a declaration; to proclaim or avow some opinion or resolution in favour or in opposition; to make known explicitly some determination; to proclaim one's self; to pronounce adhesion in favour of a party, &c.: with for or against; as, the prince declared for the allies; victory had not declared for either party; the allied powers declared against France.

Like fawning courtiers, for success they wait;
And then come smiling, and declare for fate. Dryden.

2. In law, to recite the causes of complaint against the defendant; as, the plaintiff declares in debt or trespass.—To declare off, to refuse to co-operate in any undertaking; to break off from one's party engagements, &c.—SYN. To state, affirm, aver, assert, asseverate, protest, proclaim, announce.

Declared (dē-klārd), p. and a. Made known; told explicitly; avowed; exhibited; manifested; published; proclaimed; recited; open; professed; as, the declared value of merchandise; a declared enemy.

Declaredly (dē-klār'ed-li), adv. Avowedly; explicitly.

Declaredness (dē-klār'ed-nes), n. State of being declared.

Declarer (dē-klār'ėr), n. One who makes known or publishes; one who or that which exhibits or explains. 'A declarer of tradition.' Burton.

Declension (dē-klen'shon), n. [L. declinatio, declinationis, a leaning from or away, from declino. See DECLINE.] 1. The act of declining or appearing to decline; declination; descent; slope. 'The declension of the land from that place to the sea.' Burnet.—2. A falling or declining toward a worse state; a tendency toward a less degree of excellence or perfection; as, the declension of virtue, of manners, of taste, of the sciences, of the fine arts, &c. 'In the latter date and declension of his drooping years.' South.

But the fall, the rapid and total declension, of Wilkes's fame, the utter oblivion into which his very name has passed for all purposes save the remembrance of his vices . . . this affords also a salutary lesson to the followers of the multitude. Brougham.

3. Refusal; non-acceptance.—4. In gram. (a) the inflection of nouns, adjectives, and pronouns; the declining, deviation, or leaning away of the termination of a word from the termination of its nominative case; change of termination to form the oblique cases; thus, in Latin, from rex in the nominative case, are formed regis in the genitive, regi in the dative, regem in the accusative, and rege in the ablative. (b) The rehearsing of a word as declined; the act of declining a word, as a noun. (c) A class of nouns declined on the same type; as, first or second declension.—Declension of the needle. See under DECLINATION.

Declinable (dē-klīn'a-bl), a. That may be declined; capable of changing its termination in the oblique cases; as, a declinable noun.

Declinal (dē-klīn'al), a. 1. Bending downwards; declining.—2. In geol. applied to the slope of strata from an axis.

Declinate (de'klin-āt), a. [L. declinatus, pp. of declino, declinatum. See DECLINE.] In bot. bending or bent downward; declining: applied to stamens when they are thrown to one side of a flower, as in Amaryllis.

Declination (de-klin-ā'shon), n. 1. The act or state of bending down; inclination; as, a declination of the head.—2. A declining or falling into a worse state; change from a better to a worse condition; decay; deterioration; gradual failure or diminution of strength, soundness, vigour, or excellence; subsidence; gradual appeasement; as, the declination of passion.—3. A deviation from a right line, in a literal sense; oblique motion. 'The declination of atoms in their descent.' Bentley.—4. Deviation from rectitude in behaviour or morals; obliquity of conduct; as, a declination from the path of integrity. 'Every declination and violation of the rules.' South.—5. The act of declining, refusing, or shunning; refusal; withdrawal. 'The queen's declination from marriage.' Stowe.—6. In astron. the distance of a heavenly body from the celestial equator, measured on a great circle passing through the pole and also through the body. It is equal to the complement of the polar distance of the body, and is said to be north or south according as the body is north or south of the equator. Great circles passing through the poles, and cutting the equator at right angles, are called circles of declination. Twenty-four circles of declination, dividing the equator into twenty-four arcs of 15° each, are called hour circles or horary circles; the angle contained by any two of them is called an hour angle, and the arc of the equator intercepted between them is called an hour arc.—7. In dialling, the arc of the horizon, contained between the vertical plane and the prime vertical circle, if reckoned from east or west, or between the meridian and the plane, if reckoned from north or south.—8. In gram. declension; the inflection of a noun through its various terminations. 'Declination of a noun.' Johnson.—Declination of the compass or needle, or magnetic declination, the variation of the magnetic needle from the true meridian of a place. The amount of this variation is found by a declination needle or declinometer (which see).

Declinator (de'klin-āt-ėr), n. 1. An instrument used in ascertaining the declination, as in dialling, of a plane, and in astronomy, of the stars.—2.† One who declines to agree with another; a dissentient.

The votes of the declinators could not be heard for the noise. Bp. Hacket.

Declinatory dē-klīn'a-tor-i), a. Of or pertaining to declination; characterized by declining; intimating declinature or refusal. —Declinatory plea, in old English law, a plea before trial or conviction, intended to show that the party was not liable to the penalty of the law, or was specially exempted from the jurisdiction of the court. The plea of benefit of clergy was a declinatory plea.

Declinatory (dē-klīn'a-to-ri), n. Same as Declinator, 1.

Declinature (dē-klīn'a-tūr), n. The act of declining or refusing; specifically, in Scots law, the privilege which a party has, in certain circumstances, to decline the jurisdiction of the judge before whom he is cited: used also conversely of the judge.

The declinature of that office is no less graceful. Scotsman newspaper.

Decline (dē-klīn'), v.i. pret. & pp. declined; ppr. declining. [L. declino, to bend down or aside—de, down, and a hypothetical form clino, same as Gr. klinō, to bend. Root klī, steep or sloping, seen in L. clivus. See LEAN.] 1. To lean downward; to bend over; to hang down, as from weakness, despondency, submission, or the like; as, the head declines towards the earth. Byron.—2. To sink to a lower level; to stoop, as to an unworthy object.

From me, whose love was that of dignity, to decline
Upon a wretch, whose natural gifts were poor
To those of mine. Shak.

Is it well to wish thee happy?—having known me—to decline
On a range of lower feelings, and a narrower heart than mine? Tennyson.

3.† To condescend.

He would decline even to the lowest of his family. Lady Hutchinson.

4. To lean or deviate from rectitude; to leave the path of truth or justice, or the course prescribed.

Yet do I not decline from thy testimonies. Ps. cxix. 157.

5. To approach or draw toward the close; as, the day declines.—6. To avoid or shun; to refuse; not to comply; as, he declined to take any part in the concern.—7. To tend to a less perfect state; to sink in character or value; to become diminished or impaired; to fail; to decay; as, the vigour of youth declines; health declines; virtue declines; religion declines; national credit and prosperity decline under a corrupt administration; the prices of land and goods decline at the close of a war.—8.† To incline; to tend.

The purple lustre . . . declineth in the end to the colour of wine. Holland.

9.† To incline morally; to be favourably disposed.

Your weeping sister is no wife of mine,
Nor to her bed no homage do I owe;
Far more, far more, to you do I decline. Shak.

Decline (dē-klīn'), v.t. 1. To bend downward; to move from a right line; to cause to bend, bow, or fall; to depress.

In melancholy deep, with head declined. Thomson.

2. To shun or avoid; to refuse; not to engage in; to put or turn aside; not to accept or comply with; as, he declined the contest; he declined the offer; he declined the business or pursuit.—3. In gram. to inflect; to change the termination of a word, for forming the oblique cases; as, dominus, domini, domino, dominum, domine.—4.† To cause to succumb.

To decline the conscience in compliment to the senses. Boyle.

5.† To cause to decrease or diminish; to reduce.

You have declined his means. Beau. & Fl.

Decline (dē-klīn'), n. 1. A falling off in value, number, or quality; a tendency to a worse state; diminution or decay; deterioration; as, the decline of life; the decline of strength; the decline of virtue and religion; the decline of agriculture.

Their fathers lived in the decline of literature. Swift.

2. In med. that period of a disease when the characteristic symptoms begin to abate in violence.—3. A popular name for almost all chronic diseases in which the strength and plumpness of the body gradually decrease, until the patient dies; consumption, particularly pulmonary consumption.

Decliner (dē-klīn'ėr), n. 1. One who declines.—2. In dialling, the name given to a dial which cuts either the plane of the prime vertical circle or the plane of the horizon obliquely. Called also a Declining Dial.

Declinometer (de-klīn-om'et-ėr), n. [Declination, and Gr. metron, measure.] An instrument for measuring the declination of the magnetic needle, and for observing its variations. In magnetic observatories there are permanent instruments of this kind, and they are commonly made self-registering by photographic means. It is the object of such instruments to register the small hourly and annual variations in declination, and also the variations due to magnetic storms.

Declinous (dē-klīn'us), a. In bot. declinate; bent downward.

Declivity (dē-kli'vi-ti), n. [L. declivitas, a declivity, from declivis, sloping—de, and clivus. See CLIFF.] 1. Declination from a horizontal line; slope or inclination downward, as of the ground, of a rock, or other thing: chiefly used of the earth, and opposed to acclivity, or ascent; the same slope, considered as descending, being a declivity, and considered as ascending, an acclivity. 'The declivity of its course.' Walton.—2. A surface which inclines downward; a slope. 'Commodious declivities and channels for the passage of the waters.' Derham.

Declivous, Declivitous (dē-kli'vus, dē-kli'vit-us), a. Gradually descending; not precipitous; sloping.

Decoct (dē-kokt'), v.t. [L. decoquo, decoctum, to boil down—de, and coquo, to cook, to boil.] 1. To prepare by boiling; to digest in hot or boiling water; to extract the strength or flavour of by boiling.—2. To digest in the stomach.—3. To warm, as if by boiling; to heat up; to excite.

> Can sodden water,
> A drench for sur-rein'd jades, their barley-broth,
> Decoct their cold blood to such valiant heat. Shak.

Decoctible (dē-kokt'i-bl), a. That may be boiled or digested.

Decoction (dē-kok'shon), n. [Fr. décoction. See DECOCT.] 1. The act of boiling a substance in water, for extracting its virtues. 2. The liquor in which a substance has been boiled; water impregnated with the principles of any animal or vegetable substance boiled in it; as, a weak or strong decoction of Peruvian bark.

> If a plant be boiled in water, the strained liquor is called the decoction of the plant. Arbuthnot.

Decoctive (dē-kokt'iv), a. Having power to decoct. [Rare.]

Decocture (dē-kokt'ūr), n. A substance prepared by decoction. [Rare.]

Decoit (de-koit'), n. Same as Dakoit.

Decollate (dē-kol'lāt), v.t. pret. & pp. decollated; ppr. decollating. [L. decollo, decollatum, to behead—de, from, and collum, the neck.] To behead.

Decollated (dē-kol'lāt-ed), p. and a. Beheaded; specifically, in conch. a term applied to those univalve shells which have the apex worn off in the progress of growth. This happens constantly with some shells, such as the species of Bulimus called in consequence B. decollatus.

Decollation (dē-kol-lā'shon), n. [L. decollatio. See DECOLLATE.] The act of beheading; the state of one beheaded. It is especially used of St. John the Baptist, of a festival of the Roman Catholic Church instituted in his honour, and of a painting which represents his beheading.

Decolorant (dē-kul'ėr-ant), n. A substance which removes colour, or bleaches.

Decolorate (dē-kul'ėr-āt), v.t. To deprive of colour; to decolour.

Decoloration (dē-kul'ėr-ā''shon), n. [L. decoloratio, decolorationis, discolouring—de, from, and color, colour.] Absence of colour; abstraction or loss of colour.

> Decoloration, a term . . . signifying blanching or loss of the natural colour of any object. Hooper.

Decolorimeter (dē-kol'or-im''et-ėr), n. [L. decoloro, to discolour, and Gr. metron, measure.] An instrument for estimating the decolorizing power of charcoal.

Decolorization, Decolourization (dē-kul'-ėr-iz-ā''shon), n. The process of depriving of colour.

Decolorize, Decolourize (dē-kul'ėr-īz), v.t. To deprive of colour.

Decolour, Decolor (dē-kul'ėr), v.t. To deprive of colour; to bleach.

Decomplex (dē'kom-pleks), a. [Prefix de, intens., and complex.] Repeatedly compound; made up of complex constituents.

Decomposable (dē-kom-pōz'a-bl), a. [See DECOMPOSE.] That may be decomposed; capable of being resolved into its constituent elements.

Decompose (dē-kom-pōz'), v.t. pret. & pp. decomposed; ppr. decomposing. [Fr. décomposer—de, and composer, to compose, from L. compono, compositus. See COMPOSE.] To separate the constituent parts of; to disunite the elementary particles of, as of a body the elements of which are combined by affinity or chemical attraction; to resolve into original elements.

Decompose (dē-kom-pōz'), v.i. To become resolved into constituent elements; to be set free from chemical combination; to be analyzed.

Decomposite (dē-kom'poz-it), a. [L. de, intens., and compositus, pp. of compono, compositum, to place together. See COMPOSE.] 1. Compounded a second time; compounded with things already composite.—2. In bot. compounded several times; decompound (which see).

Decomposite (dē-kom'poz-it), n. Anything compounded with things already composite: chiefly used of chemicals and of grammatical terms.

> Decomposites of three metals, or more, are too long to inquire of. Bacon.

> Compounds wherein one element is compound are called decomposites. . . . The decomposite character of such words (as midshipman, gentlemanlike) is often concealed or disguised. Latham.

Decomposition (dē-kom'pō-zi''shon), n. 1. The act of separating the constituent elements of a compound body or substance; analysis; resolution; as, the decomposition of water into its constituent elements, oxygen and hydrogen.

> Light is an all-important agent of molecular changes in organic substances. It is not here necessary for us to ascertain how light produces these compositions and decompositions. H. Spencer.

2. The state of being decomposed or resolved; release from previous combinations; disintegration; decay consequent on the loss of ingredients or elements; as, the cabinet is in a state of decomposition; his body was in an advanced state of decomposition.—Decomposition of forces, in mech. the same as Resolution of Forces. See under RESOLUTION.—Decomposition of light, the separating of a beam of light into the prismatic colours.

Decomposition † (dē-kom'pō-zi''shon), n. [Prefix de, intens., and composition.] The act of compounding things already compound; a combination of compounds. 'A dexterous decomposition of two or three words together.' Instruct. concerning Oratory.

Decompound (dē-kom-pound'), v.t. [Prefix de, priv., and compound.] To decompose. [Rare.]

> It divides and decompounds objects into a thousand curious parts. Hazlitt.

Decompound (dē-kom-pound'), v.t. [Prefix de, intens., and compound.] To compound a second time; to compound or mix with that which is already compound; to form by a second composition.

Decompound (dē-kom-pound'), a. 1. Composed of things or words already compounded; compounded a second time.—2. In bot. divided into a number of compound divisions, as a leaf or panicle. A decompound leaf, a leaf in which the primary petiole gives off subsidiary petioles, each supporting a compound leaf. A decompound flower, a flower formed of compound flowers, or containing, within a common calyx, smaller calyxes, common to several flowers.

Decompound Leaf.

Decompound (dē-kom-pound'), n. A decomposite (which see).

Decompoundable (dē-kom-pound'a-bl), a. That may be decompounded.

Deconsecrate (dē-kon'sē-krāt), v.t. To deprive of sacred character or of the virtue conferred by consecration; to unconsecrate; to secularize; as, to deconsecrate a church.

Deconsecration (dē-kon'sē-krā''shon), n. The act of unconsecrating or depriving of sacred character; specifically, the ceremony employed in unconsecrating or rendering secular anything consecrated, as a church, cemetery, or the like. The forms to be observed do not appear in the Prayer Book, and the ceremony is of very rare occurrence.

Decoped, † pp. [Fr. découpé.] Cut down. Chaucer.

Decorament † (de'kō-ra-ment), n. Ornament.

Decorate (de'kō-rāt), v.t. pret. & pp. decorated; ppr. decorating. [L. decoro, from decus, decor, comeliness, grace.] To deck with something becoming or ornamental; to adorn; to beautify; to embellish; as, to decorate the person; to decorate an edifice; to decorate a lawn with flowers; to decorate a hero with honours, or a lady with accomplishments.—Adorn, Decorate, Embellish. See under ADORN.—SYN. To deck, beautify, adorn, embellish, ornament.

Decorated (de'kō-rāt-ed), p. and a. Adorned; beautified; embellished.—Decorated style, in arch. the second style of pointed architecture, in use in Britain from the end of the thirteenth to the beginning of the fifteenth century, when it passed into the Perpendicular. It is distinguished from the Early English, from which it was developed, by the more flowing or wavy lines of its tracery, especially of its windows, by the more graceful combinations of its foliage, by the greater richness of the decorations of the capitals of its columns, and of the mouldings of its doorways and niches, finials, &c., and generally by a style of ornamentation more profuse and naturalistic, though probably somewhat florid. The Decorated style has been divided into two periods, viz. the Early or Geometrical Decorated period, in which geometrical figures are largely introduced; and the Decorated style proper, in which the peculiar characteristics of the style are exhibited. This latter period has left us the finest monuments of British architecture.

Window, Decorated Style, Garsington, Oxford.

Decoration (de-kō-rā'shon), n. 1. The act of adorning or embellishing; ornamentation.—2. That which decorates or adorns; something added by way of embellishment; ornament.—3. Any badge, as a medal, cross of honour, &c., bestowed for distinguished services.—SYN. Ornament, embellishment, garniture, trapping.

Decorative (de'kō-rāt-iv), a. Adorning; suited to embellish; as, decorative art.

Decorativeness (de'kō-rāt-iv-nes), n. Quality of being decorative.

Decorator (de'kō-rāt-ėr), n. One who adorns or embellishes.

Decore† (dē-kōr'), v. t. To beautify; to decorate. 'To decore and beautifie the house of God.' Hall.

Decorement† (dē-kōr'ment), n. Embellishment; ornament; decoration.

These decorements which beautify and adorn her. Heywood.

Decorous (dē-kō'rus), a. [L. decorus, becoming.] Decent; suitable to a character, or to the time, place, and occasion; becoming; proper; befitting; as, a decorous speech; decorous behaviour; a decorous dress. 'A decorous pretext for the war.' Motley.

Decorously (dē-kō'rus-li), adv. In a becoming manner.

Decorousness (dē-kō'rus-nes), n. Decency or propriety of behaviour.

Decorticate (dē-kor'ti-kāt), v. t. pret. & pp. decorticated; ppr. decorticating. [L. decortico, decorticatum, to strip the bark off—de, priv., and cortex, bark.] To strip off the bark of; to peel; to husk; to take off the exterior coat of. 'Great barley dried and decorticated.' Arbuthnot.

Decortication (dē-kor'ti-kā"shon), n. The act of stripping off bark or husk.

Decorum (dē-kō'rum), n. [L., what is becoming.] 1. Propriety of speech or behaviour; suitableness of speech and behaviour to one's own character and to the characters present, or to the place and occasion; seemliness; decency; opposed to rudeness, licentiousness, or levity. To speak and behave with decorum is essential to good breeding.

He kept with princes due decorum,
Yet never stood in awe before 'em. Swift.

2. In arch. the suitableness of a building, and of its parts and ornaments, to its place and uses.

Decouplé (de-köp-lā'), pp. In her. uncoupled; parted or severed; as, a chevron decouplé.

Decourt† (dē-kōrt'), v. t. To drive or dismiss from court; to deprive of court influence. 'The Master of Gray, now decourted.' Melvil.

Decoy (dē-koi'), n. [Properly duck-coy. Coy is from D. kooi, a cage; hence vogel-kooi, a bird-cage, an apparatus for entrapping water-fowl. The name, with the thing, was probably introduced from Holland. In Norfolk and Suffolk coy is a decoy and a coop for lobsters.] 1. A place into which wild fowls are decoyed in order to be caught. A decoy pond is kept only in a secluded situation. Several channels or pipes of a curved form, covered with light hooped net-work, lead from the pond in various directions. The wild fowl are enticed to enter the wide mouth of the channel by tamed ducks trained for the purpose, or by grain scattered on the water. When they have got well into the covered channel they are surprised by the decoy-man and his dog, and driven up into the funnel net at the far end, where they are easily caught.—2. A fowl, or the likeness of one, employed to entice other fowl into a net or within range of shot; as, we used a duck as a decoy.—3. Anything intended to lead into a snare; any lure or allurement that deceives and misleads into evil, danger, or the power of an enemy; a stratagem employed to mislead or lead into danger.

Decoy (dē-koi'), v. t. [See noun.] 1. To lead or lure by artifice into a snare, with a view to catch; to draw into any situation to be taken by a foe; to entrap by any means which deceive; as, the fowler decoys ducks into a net; troops may be decoyed into an ambush; one ship decoys another within reach of her shot.—2. To allure, attract, or entice, without notion of entrapping.

The king might be decoyed thence. Clarendon.

—Allure, Entice, Decoy. See under ALLURE. SYN. To allure, entice, inveigle, lure, seduce.

Decoy-bird, Decoy-duck (dē-koi'bėrd, dē-koi'duk), n. 1. A bird or duck employed to draw others into a net or situation to be taken.—2. A person employed to decoy persons into some snare. [Colloq.]

Decoy-man (dē-koi'man), n. A man employed in decoying and catching fowls.

Decrease (dē-krēs'), v. i. pret. & pp. decreased; ppr. decreasing. [L. decresco—de, down, and cresco, to grow, to increase.] To become less; to be diminished gradually in extent, bulk, quantity, or amount, or in strength, influence, or excellence; as, the days decrease in length from June to December.

He must increase, but I must decrease. John iii. 30.

—Decreasing series. See PROGRESSION.—Decrease, Diminish. To decrease is to become less by degrees and from causes imperceptible or not necessarily perceptible, acting, it may be, from within the object itself, and which are not necessarily had regard to; as, the swelling decreases daily. To diminish is to grow less through the action of some external cause which is had regard to; as, his fortune diminishes daily through extravagance; the troops diminish daily through disease and sorties. Decrease is the appropriate word for reduction of bulk or volume; diminish, for reduction of number. The words, however, are frequently employed indiscriminately.—SYN. To lessen, abate, diminish, dwindle, contract, ebb, subside.

Decrease (dē-krēs'), v. t. To lessen; to make smaller in dimensions, amount, quality, or excellence, &c.; to diminish gradually or by small deductions; as, extravagance decreases the means of charity; every payment decreases a debt; intemperance decreases the strength and powers of life.

Nor cherish'd they relations poor,
That might decrease their present store. Prior.

Decrease (dē-krēs'), n. A becoming less; gradual diminution; wane (as applied to the moon); decay; as, a decrease of revenue; a decrease of strength.

See in what time the seeds, set in the increase of the moon, come to a certain height, and how they differ from those that are set in the decrease of the moon. Bacon.

Decreasingly (dē-krēs'ing-li), adv. By diminishing.

Decreation (dē-krē-ā'shon), n. [Prefix de, priv., and creation.] The undoing of the act of creation; annihilation. [Rare.]

Especially the continual decreation and annihilation of the souls of the brutes. Cudworth.

Decree (dē-krē'), n. [L. decretum, from decerno, to judge—de, and cerno, to judge, to divide; Fr. décret. See DECERN.] 1. Judicial decision or determination of a litigated cause. Formerly, in England, the term was specially used for the judgment of a court of equity, but the word judgment is now used in reference to the decisions of all the divisions of the supreme court.—2. The judgment or award of an umpire in a case submitted to him.—3. In the civil law, a determination or judgment of the emperor on a suit between parties. Among the Romans, when all legislative power was centred in the emperors, it became the custom to ask for their opinion and decision in disputed cases. Their decisions were called decrees, and formed part of the imperial constitutions.—4. An edict or law made by a council for regulating any business within their jurisdiction; as, the decrees of ecclesiastical councils.—5. In general, an order, edict, or law made by a superior authority as a rule to govern inferiors.

And statesmen at her council met
Who knew the seasons when to take Occasion by the hand, and make
The bounds of freedom wider yet
By shaping some august decree. Tennyson.

6. Established law or rule.

He made a decree for the rain. Job xxviii. 26.

7. In theol. the purpose of God concerning future events.—Decree nisi (decree unless), in English law, the order made by the court for divorce, after satisfactory proof is given in support of a petition for dissolution of marriage; it remains conditional for at least six months, after which, unless sufficient cause is shown, it is made absolute, and the dissolution takes effect. The word occurs in a number of phrases made use of in Scots law (in which it is also written Decreet); as —Decree in absence, a decree pronounced against a defender who has not appeared or pleaded on the merits of the cause, the same as a judgment by default in English common law. Decree dative, a decree of a commissary conferring on an executor (not being an executor-nominate) the office of executor. Decree of registration, a decree obtained without an action for payment of money secured by a bond or deed containing a clause of consent to registration for execution. Decree of modification, a decree of the teind court modifying a stipend to the clergyman, but not allocating it upon the different heritors. Decree of locality, a decree of the teind court allocating the modified stipend on the different heritors, in the proportions in which they are to pay it. Decree of valuation of teinds, a decree of the teind court determining the extent and value of an heritor's teinds. Decree arbitral, an award by one or more arbiters.—SYN. Edict, judgment, law, order, ordinance, proclamation.

Decree (dē-krē'), v. t. pret. & pp. decreed; ppr. decreeing. 1. To determine judicially; to resolve by sentence; as, the court decreed a restoration of the property.—2. To determine or resolve legislatively; to fix or appoint; to determine or decide on.

Thou shalt decree a thing, and it shall be established. Job xxii. 28.

They themselves decreed
Their own revolt, not I. Milton.

Decree (dē-krē'), v. i. To determine; to predetermine immutably; to make an edict; to appoint by edict.

As my eternal purpose hath decreed. Milton.

Decreeable (dē-krē'a-bl), a. That may be decreed.

Decreement† (dē-krē'ment), n. Decree. 'This unjust decreement.' Fox.

Decreer, Decreeer (dē-krē'ėr), n. One who decrees. Goodwin.

Decreet (dē-krēt'), n. In Scots law, see DECREE, 1, and sub-entries after 7.

Decrement (de'krē-ment), n. [L. decrementum, from decresco. See DECREASE.] 1. Decrease; waste; the state of becoming less gradually.

Rocks, mountains, and the other elevations of the earth suffer a continual decrement. Woodward.

2. The quantity lost by gradual diminution or waste.—3. In her. the wane of the moon. 4. In crystal. a successive diminution of the layers of molecules applied to the faces of the primitive form, by which the secondary forms are hypothetically produced.—5. In math. the small part by which a variable quantity becomes less and less: opposed to increment.—Equal decrement of life, a phrase employed in the doctrine of annuities, signifying that of a given number of lives there should be an equal annual decrease within a given period of years.

Decrepit (dē-krep'it), a. [Fr. décrépit, from L. decrepitus, broken down, worn out; 'concerning the origin of which,' says Littré, 'Latin etymologists have nothing but conjectures without foundation,' but which is generally regarded as being derived from the preposition de, and crepare, to make a noise, and hence as meaning originally noiseless.] Broken down with age; wasted or worn by the infirmities of old age; being in the last stage of decay; weakened by age. 'Beggary or decrepit age.' Milton. Sometimes incorrectly spelled Decrepid.

Last, winter comes, decrepid, old, and dull. Fenyns.

Decrepitate (dē-krep'it-āt), v. t. pret. & pp. decrepitated; ppr. decrepitating. [L. decrepo, to break or burst, to crackle—de and crepo.] To roast or calcine in a strong heat, with a continual bursting or crackling of the substance; as, to decrepitate salt.

Decrepitate (dē-krep'it-āt), v. i. To crackle, as salts when roasting.

Decrepitation (dē-krep'it-ā"shon), n. The act of flying asunder with a crackling noise on being heated, or the crackling noise, attended with the flying asunder of their parts, made by several salts and minerals when heated. It is caused by the unequal sudden expansion of their substance by the heat, or by the expansion and volatilization of water held mechanically within them.

Decrepitude, Decrepitness (dē-krep'it-ūd, dē-krep'it-nes), n. [See DECREPIT.] The broken, crazy state of the body, produced by decay and the infirmities of age.

Many seem to pass on from youth to decrepitude without any reflection on the end of life. Johnson.

Decrepity† (dē-krep'i-ti), n. Decrepitude. Chapman.

Decrescendo (dā-kresh-en'dō or dē-kres-sen'do), n. [It.] In music, a term which denotes the gradual weakening of the sound.

Defensible (dē-fens'i-bl), a. 1. That may be defended; as, a defensible city.—2. That may be vindicated, maintained, or justified; as, a defensible cause.—3.† Contributing to defence; capable of defending; calculated to defend.

Where nothing but the sound of Hotspur's name
Did seem defensible. Shak.

Defensive (dē-fens'iv), a. [Fr. défensif, from L. defendo, defensum. See DEFEND.] 1. That serves to defend; proper for defence; as, defensive armour, which repels attacks or blows: opposed to offensive arms, which are used in attack.—2. Carried on in resisting attack or aggression; as, defensive war, in distinction from offensive war, which is aggressive.

Since, therefore, we cannot win by an offensive war, at least a land-war, the model of our government seems naturally contrived for the defensive part. Dryden.

3. In a state or posture to defend.—Defensive allegation, the mode of propounding circumstances of defence by a defendant in the spiritual courts, to which he is entitled to the plaintiff's answer upon oath, and may thence proceed to proofs as well as his antagonist.

Defensive (dē-fens'iv), n. Safeguard; that which defends.

Wars preventive, upon just fears, are true defensives. Bacon.

—To be on the defensive, or to stand on the defensive, to be or stand in a state or posture of defence or resistance, in opposition to aggression or attack.

Defensively (dē-fens'iv-li), adv. In a defensive manner; on the defensive; in defence.

Defensory (dē-fens'o-ri), a. Tending to defend; defensive. Johnson.

Defer (dē-fėr'), v.t. pret. & pp. deferred; ppr. deferring. [L. differo—dis, from, and fero, to bear.] To delay; to put off; to postpone to a future time; to adjourn; as, to defer the execution of a design.

The word saving does not imply that what is saved is not consumed, nor even necessarily that its consumption is deferred, but only that, if consumed immediately, it is not consumed by the person who raises it. J. S. Mill.

Defer (dē-fėr'), v.i. To put off; to delay; to procrastinate.

Defer not till to-morrow to be wise;
To-morrow's sun to thee may never rise. Congreve.

Defibrination (dē-fī'brin-ā"shon), n. Act or process of defibrinizing, or depriving of fibrine.

Defibrinize (dē-fī'brin-īz), v.t. pret. & pp. defibrinized; ppr. defibrinizing. [L. de, from, and E. fibrin.] To deprive of fibrin; specifically, to remove fibrin from fresh blood by whipping it with rods.

Deficiency, Deficience (de-fi'shen-si, de-fi'shens), n. [See DEFICIENT.] 1. A failing; a falling short; imperfection; as, a deficiency in moral duties.

Thou in thyself art perfect, and in thee
Is no deficience found. Milton.

Marlborough was a man not only of the most idle and frivolous pursuits, but was so miserably ignorant, that his deficiencies made him the ridicule of his contemporaries. Buckle.

2. Want, either total or partial; defect; absence; something less than is necessary; as, a deficiency of means; a deficiency of revenue; a deficiency of blood.

To which he answer'd scoffingly,
'Good soul! suppose I grant it thee,
Who'll weep for thy deficiency?' Tennyson.

SYN. Imperfection, want, failing, failure, defect.

Deficient (de-fi'shent), a. [L. deficiens, deficientis, ppr. of defcio, to fail—de, and facio, to do.] 1. Wanting; defective; imperfect; not sufficient or adequate; as, deficient estate; deficient strength.—2. Wanting; not having a full or adequate supply; as, the country may be deficient in the means of carrying on war.—Deficient numbers, in arith. numbers the sum of whose aliquot parts is less than the numbers themselves; thus, 8 is a deficient number as the sum of its aliquot parts 1, 2, 4 is only 7.—SYN. Wanting, defective, imperfect, failing.

Deficiently (de-fi'shent-li), adv. In a defective manner.

Deficientness (de-fi'shent-nes), n. State of being deficient. [Rare.]

Deficit (de'fi-sit), n. Want; deficiency; as, a deficit in the taxes or revenue.

Squandering, and payment by loan, is no way to check a deficit. Carlyle.

Defier (dē-fī'ėr), n. [See DEFY.] A challenger; one who dares to combat or encounter; one who braves; one who acts in contempt of opposition, law, or authority; as, a defier of the laws.

Defiguration† (dē-fī'gūr-ā"shon), n. [L. de, priv., and figura, figure or form.] A disfiguring. 'Defigurations and deformations of Christ.' Bp. Hall.

Defigure† (dē-fī'gūr), v.t. [L. de, down, and figuro, to shape.] To delineate. 'Stones as they are here defigured.' Weever.

Defilade (dē-fi-lād'), v.t. pret. & pp. defiladed; ppr. defilading. [Fr. défiler, from défiler. See DEFILE.] In fort. to erect defensive works, as ramparts, around a fortification, so as to protect the interior when in danger of being commanded by guns placed on some higher point; as, to defilade an exposed side.

Defilading (dē-fil-ād'ing), n. That branch of fortification, the object of which is to determine (when the intended work would be commanded by eminences within the range of fire-arms) the directions or heights of the lines of rampart or parapet, so that the interior of the work may not be incommoded by a fire directed to it from such eminences.

Defile (dē-fīl'), v.t. pret. & pp. defiled; ppr. defiling. [This word exhibits a combination of the Romance or L. prefix de with the A. Sax. fylan (O.E. and Sc. file, to defile), from fūl, foul. This common prefix seems to have been substituted by confusion for bs or ge in A. Sax. befylan, gefylan, to defile. See FOUL.] 1. To make unclean; to render foul or dirty, in a general sense.

They that touch pitch will be defiled. Shak.

2. To make impure; to render turbid; as, the water or liquor is defiled.—3. To soil or sully; to tarnish, as reputation, &c.

He is among the greatest prelates of the age, however his character may be defiled by dirty hands. Swift.

They shall defile thy brightness. Ezek. xxviii. 7.

4. To pollute; to make ceremonially unclean.

That which dieth of itself, or is torn with beasts, he shall not eat, to defile himself therewith. Lev. xxii. 8.

5. To corrupt the chastity of; to debauch; to violate; to tarnish the purity of the character of by lewdness.

Shechem . . . lay with her and defiled her. Gen. xxxiv. 2.

6. To taint, in a moral sense; to corrupt; to vitiate; to render impure with sin.

Defile not yourselves with the idols of Egypt. Ezek. xx. 7.

He hath defiled the sanctuary of the Lord. Num. xix. 20.

SYN. To pollute, vitiate, contaminate, corrupt, stain, soil, dirty, sully, tarnish, violate, debauch.

Defile (dē-fīl'), v.i. pret. & pp. defiled; ppr. defiling. [Fr. défiler—de, and file, a row or line, from L. filum, a thread.] To march off in a line, or file by file; to file off.

The Turks defiled before the enemy. Gibbon.

Defile (dē-fīl'), v.t. In fort. to deflade.

Defile (dē-fīl'), n. [See DEFILE, v.i.] A narrow passage or way, in which troops may march only in a file, or with a narrow front; a long narrow pass, as between hills, &c.

Defilement (dē-fīl'ment), n. 1. The act of defiling, or state of being defiled; foulness; dirtiness; uncleanness.—2. Corruption of morals, principles, or character; impurity; pollution by sin.

The chaste cannot rake into such filth without danger of defilement. Addison.

Defilement (dē-fīl'ment), n. In fort. defilading (which see).

Defiler (dē-fīl'ėr), n. One who defiles; one who corrupts or violates; that which pollutes.

Defiliation (dē-fil'li-ā''shon), n. [L. de, priv., and filius, a son.] The abstraction of a child from its parents; the act of rendering childless. 'Irreparable and hopeless defiliations.' Lamb. [Rare.]

Definable (dē-fīn'a-bl), a. [See DEFINE.] 1. That may be limited, or have its limits ascertained; hence, capable of having its extent ascertained with precision; capable of being fixed and determined; as, the extent of the Russian Empire is hardly definable.—2. That may be defined; capable of having its signification rendered certain, or expressed with certainty or precision; as, definable words.—3. Having properties that may be determined and enunciated, as a triangle is a definable figure.—4. That may be fixed, determined, or ascertained; as, the time or period is not definable.

Concerning the time of the end of the world, the question is whether that time be definable or no. T. Burnet.

Definably (dē-fīn'a-bli), adv. In a definable manner.

Define (dē-fīn'), v.t. pret. & pp. defined; ppr. defining. [L. definio—de, and finio, to end, to limit, from finis, end.] 1. To determine or describe the end or limit of; to determine with precision; as, to define the extent of a kingdom or country.—2. To mark the limit; to circumscribe; to bound.

The right to wear red on different parts of the dress, and to have red carriages, is defined. Brougham.

3. To determine or ascertain the extent of the meaning of; to ascertain the signification of; to explain what a word is understood to express; as, to define the words virtue, courage, belief, or charity. 'Like wit, much talked of, not to be defined.' Otway.—4. To describe; to ascertain or explain the distinctive properties or circumstances of a thing; as, to define a line or an angle.—5.† To determine; to settle; to decide.

These warlike champions, all in armour shine, Assembled were in field the chalenge to define. Spenser.

Define† (dē-fīn'), v.i. To determine; to decide.

The unjust judge is the capital remover of landmarks, when he defineth amiss of lands and properties. Bacon.

Defined (dē-fīnd'), p. and a. Having the extent ascertained; having the signification determined; having the precise limit marked, or having a determinate limit.

No one had a defined portion of land or any certain bounds to his possessions. Brougham.

Definement† (dē-fīn'ment), n. The act of defining; description; definition.

Sir, this definement suffers no perdition in you. Shak.

Definer (dē-fīn'ėr), n. He who defines; he who ascertains or marks the limits; he who determines or explains the signification of a word, or describes the distinctive properties of a thing.

Definishe†, v.t. [Fr.] To define; to make a definition of. Chaucer.

Definite (de'fin-it), a. [L. definitus, pp. of definio, definitum. See DEFINE.] 1. Having certain limits; bounded with precision; determinate; as, a definite extent of land; definite dimensions; definite measure.—2. Having certain limits in signification; determinate; certain; precise; as, a definite word, term, or expression.—3. Fixed; determinate; exact; precise. 'Some certain and definite time.' Ayliffe.—4. In gram. defining; limiting; determining the extent; as, the definite article.—Definite proportions, in chem. the relative quantities in which bodies unite to form compounds. Called also Combining Proportions, Chemical Equivalents, or Equivalent. See EQUIVALENT.—Definite term, in logic, a term which defines or marks out a particular class of beings, or a single person, as distinguished from an indefinite term, which does not define or mark out an object.—Definite inflorescence, in bot. same as Centrifugal inflorescence.—SYN. Determinate, certain, precise, exact, clear.

Definite (de'fin-it), n. Thing defined. Ayliffe. [Rare or obsolete.]

Definitely (de'fin-it-li), adv. In a definite manner.

Definiteness (de'fin-it-nes), n. Certainty of extent; certainty of signification; determinateness.

Definition (de-fi-ni'shon), n. [L. definitio, definitionis, a limiting, a defining—definio, definitum. See DEFINE.] 1. The act of defining, determining, distinguishing, explaining, or establishing the signification of. 'Definition being nothing but making another understand by words what the term defined stands for.' Locke.—2. A brief and precise description of a thing by its properties; an explanation of the signification of a word or term, or of what a word is understood to express; as, a definition of wit, or of a circle. Logicians distinguish definitions into nominal and real. A nominal definition explains the meaning of a term by some equivalent word or expression supposed to be better known. A real definition explains the nature of the thing. A real definition is again accidental, or a description of the accidents, as causes, properties, effects, &c.; or essential, which explains the constituent parts of the essence or nature of the thing. An essential definition is, moreover, metaphysical or logical, defining 'by the genus and difference,' as it is called; as, for example, 'a plant is an organized being, destitute of sensation,' where the part first of the definition states the genus (organized being), and the latter the difference (destitute of sensation, other organized beings possessing sensation); or physical, when it distinguishes the physical parts of the essence; thus, a plant is distinguished by the leaves, stalk, root, &c. A strictly accurate definition can be given of only a few objects. The most simple things are the least capable of definition, from the difficulty of finding terms more simple and intelligible than the one to be defined.

Aldrich, having given as an instance of a nominal definition the absurd one of 'homo, qui ex humo,' has led some to conclude that the nominal definition must be founded on the etymology; or at least that such was his meaning. But that it was not, is sufficiently plain from the circumstance that Wallis (from whose work his is almost entirely abridged) expressly says the contrary. . . . It is plain that the etymology of a term has nothing to do with any logical consideration of it. Whately.

Definitional (de-fi-ni'shon-al), a. Of or belonging to a definition; used for defining; abounding in definitions.

Definitive (dē-fin'it-iv), a. [L. definitivus, definitive, from definio. See DEFINE.] 1. Limiting the extent; determinate; positive; express; as, a definitive term.—2. Limiting; ending; determining; final: opposed to conditional, provisional, or interlocutory; as, a definitive sentence or decree.—3.† Peremptory; absolutely determined.

Never crave him; we are definitive. Shak.

Definitive (dē-fin'it-iv), n. In gram. a term applied to a word used to define or limit the extent of the signification of an appellative or common noun. Such are the Greek article ho, hē, to; the Latin demonstrative hic, ille, ipse; the, this, and that in English; le, la, les in French; il, la, lo in Italian. Thus, tree is an appellative or common noun; the tree, this tree, that tree designate a particular tree, determinate or known. Homo signifies man; hic homo, ille homo, a particular man, &c. But in some languages the definitives have lost their original use in a great degree, as in the Greek and French. Thus, 'La force de la vertu' must be rendered in English 'the strength of virtue,' not 'the strength of the virtue.' The first la is a definitive; the last has no definitive effect.

Definitively (dē-fin'it-iv-li). adv. 1. Determinately; positively; expressly.

Definitively thus I answer you. Shak.

2. Finally; conclusively; unconditionally; as, the points between the parties are definitively settled.

Definitiveness (dē-fin'it-iv-nes), n. Determinateness; decisiveness; conclusiveness.

Definitude (dē-fin'i-tūd), n. Definiteness; exactitude; precision.

Though thus destitute of the light and definitude of mathematical representations, philosophy is allowed no adequate language of its own. Sir W. Hamilton.

Defix† (dē-fiks'), v.t. [L. defigo, defixum—de, intens., and figō, to fasten.] To fix; to fasten.

The country parson is generally sad because he knows nothing but the cross of Christ, his mind being defixed on and with those nails wherewith his Master was. G. Herbert.

Deflagrability (dē-flā'gra-bil''i-ti), n. [See DEFLAGRATE.] In chem. combustibility; the quality of taking fire and burning away. 'The deflagrability . . . of saltpetre.' Boyle.

Deflagrable (dē-flā'gra-bl), a. Combustible; having the quality of taking fire and burning, as alcohol, oils, &c.

Deflagrate (de'fla-grāt), v.t. pret. and pp. deflagrated; ppr. deflagrating. [L. deflagro, deflagratum—de, intens., and flagro, to burn.] To set fire to; to burn; to consume; as, to deflagrate oil or spirit.

Deflagrate (de'fla-grāt), v.i. To burn rapidly; thus, when a mixture of charcoal and nitre is thrown into a red-hot crucible it burns with a kind of explosion, or deflagrates.—Deflagrating mixtures, combustible mixtures, generally made with nitre, the oxygen of which is the active ingredient in promoting their combustion.

Deflagration (de-fla-grā'shon), n. A kindling or setting fire to a substance; burning; combustion; a rapid combustion of a mixture, attended with much evolution of flame and vapour, as of nitre and charcoal. The process for oxidizing substances by means of nitre is called deflagration, and is generally performed by mixing the inflammable body with an equal weight of the nitrate or chlorate of potassium, and projecting the mixture in small portions at a time into a red-hot crucible. This term is also applied to the rapid combustion of metals by the electric spark.

Deflagrator (de'fla-grāt-ėr), n. A galvanic instrument for producing combustion, particularly the combustion of metallic substances.

Deflect (dē-flekt'), v.i. [L. deflecto—de, and flecto, to turn or bend.] To turn from or aside; to deviate from a true course or right line; to swerve.

At some part of the Azores the needle deflecteth not, but lieth in the true meridian. Sir T. Browne.

Deflect (dē-flekt'), v.t. To cause to turn aside; to turn or bend from a right line or regular course.

The Gulf Stream . . . is deflected eastward by a current setting in from Baffin's Bay. Brande.

Deflected (dē-flekt'ed), p. and a. 1. Turned aside or from a direct line or course.—2. In bot. bending downward archwise.

Deflection (dē-flek'shon), n. 1. Deviation; the act of turning aside; a turning from a true line or the regular course: used either in a physical or moral sense.

Needles . . . at the very line . . . stand without deflection. Sir T. Browne.

King David found out the deflection and indirectness of our minds. W. Montague.

2. Naut. the departure of a ship from its true course.—3. In optics, a deviation of the rays of light toward the surface of an opaque body; inflection.—4. In math. a term applied to the distance by which a curve departs from another curve, or from a straight line; and also to any effect, either of curvature or of discontinuous change of direction.—5. In mech. the bending of any material exposed to a transverse strain.

Deflective (dē-flekt'iv), a. Causing deflection or deviation.—Deflective forces, in mech. those forces which act upon a moving body in a direction different from that in which it actually moves, in consequence of which it is made to deviate from its course.

Deflector (dē-flekt'ėr), n. In mach. the diaphragm of the furnace of a boiler, by means of which air and gas are deflected and mingled, and time and room to burn given them.

Deflexed (dē-flekst'), p. and a. The same as Deflected.

Deflexion (dē-flek'shon), n. Same as Deflection.

Deflexure (dē-fleks'ūr), n. A bending down; a turning aside; deviation.

Defloorate (dē-flōr'āt), a. [L.L. defloratus, from defloro, to deflour—de, and floreo. See FLOWER.] In bot. a term applied to the anthers of flowers when they have shed their pollen; and also to plants when their flowers have fallen.

Defloration (dē-flōr-ā'shon), n. [Fr. See DEFLOUR.] 1. The act of deflouring; the act of depriving of the flower or prime beauties; particularly, the act of taking away a woman's virginity; rape. Johnson.—2. A selection of the flower or most valuable part of anything.

The laws of Normandy are, in a great measure, the defloration of the English laws. Sir M. Hale.

Deflour (dē-flour'), v.t. [Fr. déflorer; L.L. defloro—L. de, and flos, floris, a flower. See FLOWER.] 1. To deprive a woman of her virginity, either by force or with consent; to violate; to ravish; to seduce.

Now will I hence to seek my lovely Moor,
And let my spleenful sons this trull deflour. Shak.

2. To take away the prime beauty and grace of anything.

The sweetness of his soul was deflowred. Jer. Taylor.

3.† To deprive of flowers. 'Deflouring the gardens.' Mountague.

Deflourer (dē-flour'ėr), n. One who deflours.

Deflow† (dē-flō'), v.i. [L. defluo—de, down, and fluō, to flow.] To flow down. Sir T. Browne.

Deflower (dē-flou'ėr), v.t. Same as Deflour.

Defluous† (dē'flū-us), a. [L. defluus—de, and fluo, to flow.] Flowing down; falling off. Bailey.

Defluvium (dē-flū'vi-um), n. [L.] A falling off, as of the hair or bark of trees, by disease.

Deflux† (dē-fluks'), n. [L. defluxus—de, and fluo, fluxum, to flow.] A flowing down; a running downward. 'Deflux of humours.' Bacon. See DEFLUXION.

Defluxion (dē-fluk'shon), n. [L. defluxio, defluxionis, a flowing off, from defluo, defluxum, to flow down—de, and fluo, to flow.] In med. a flowing, running, or falling of humours or fluid matter from a superior to an inferior part of the body; properly, an inflammation of a part, attended with increased secretion; a discharge or flowing off of humours; as, a defluxion from the nose or head in catarrh: sometimes used synonymously with inflammation.

Defly† (def'li), adv. [For deftly (which see).] Dexterously; skilfully; deftly.

Defœdation, n. Same as Defedation.

Defoliate, Defoliated (dē-fō'li-āt, dē-fō'li-āt-ed), a. Deprived of leaves.

Defoliation (dē-fō'li-ā''shon), n. [L. de, priv., and folium, a leaf. See FOLIO.] The fall of the leaf or shedding of leaves; the time or season of shedding leaves in autumn.

The inordinate love of money and of fame are base and degrading passions. Wirt.

—Degrading causes, in geol. those causes which refer to the dissolving and wearing down of the elevated parts of the earth's surface, and the carrying of these parts down into lower levels, as atmospheric influences, the agency of rivers and of the ocean.

Degradingly (dē-grād'ing-li), adv. In a degrading manner, or in a way to depreciate.

Degravation† (de-gra-vā'shon), n. [L. degravo—de, and gravis, heavy.] The act of making heavy.

Degree (dē-grē'), n. [Fr. degré; Norm. degret; from L. gradus, a step. See GRADE and DEGRADE.] 1.† A step, as of a stair; a stair, or set of steps.

By ladders, or else by degree. Chaucer.

2. Fig. a step or single movement, upward or downward, toward any end, whether moral or physical; one of a series of progressive advances; as, he is a degree worse than his neighbour.

We have feet to scale and climb
By slow degrees, by more and more,
The cloudy summits of our time. Longfellow.

3. Measure of advancement; hence, relative position attained; grade; rank; station; order; quality.

Great indeed
His name and high was his degree in heaven. Milton.

4. In genealogy, a certain distance or remove in the line of descent, determining the proximity of blood; as, a relation in the third or fourth degree.—5. Measure; extent; as, the light is intense to a degree that is intolerable; we suffer an extreme degree of heat or cold.—6. The 360th part of the circumference of any circle, the circumference of every circle being supposed to be divided into 360 equal parts, called degrees. A degree of latitude is the 360th part of the earth's circumference north or south of the equator, measured on a great circle at right angles to the equator, and a degree of longitude the same part of the surface east or west of any given meridian, measured on a circle parallel to the equator. Degrees are marked by a small ° near the top of the last figure of the number which expresses them; thus, 45° is 45 degrees. The degree is subdivided into sixty equal parts, called minutes; and the minute is again subdivided into sixty equal parts, called seconds. Thus, 45° 12′ 20″ means 45 degrees, 12 minutes, and 20 seconds. The magnitude or quantity of angles is estimated in degrees and parts of a degree, because equal angles at the centre of a circle are subtended by equal arcs, and equal angles at the centres of different circles are subtended by similar arcs, or arcs containing the same number of degrees and parts of a degree. An angle is said to be so many degrees as are contained in the arc of any circle intercepted between the lines which contain the angle, the angular point being the centre of the circle. Thus we say an angle of 90°, or of 45° 24′. It is also usual to say that a star is elevated so many degrees above the horizon, or declines so many degrees from the equator, or such a town is situated in so many degrees of latitude or longitude. The length of a degree depends upon the radius of the circle of the circumference of which it is a part, the length being greater the greater the length of the radius. Hence, the length of a degree of longitude is greatest at the equator, and diminishes continually towards the poles. Under the equator a degree of longitude contains 60 geographical, and 69½ statute miles. The degrees of latitude are found to increase in length from the equator to the poles, owing to the figure of the earth.—7. In alg. a term applied to equations, to show what is the highest power under which the unknown quantity appears; thus, if the index of the highest power of the unknown quantity be 3 or 4, the equation is respectively of the 3d or 4th degree.—8. In music, an interval of sound, marked by a line on the scale.—9. In arith. three figures taken together in numeration; thus, the number 270,360 consists of two degrees. 10. A division, space, or interval, marked on a mathematical, meteorological, or other instrument, as on a thermometer or barometer.—11. In universities, a mark of distinction conferred on students, members, or distinguished strangers, as a testimony of proficiency in arts and sciences, or as a mark of respect, giving them a kind of rank, and entitling them to certain privileges. Degrees are much the same in all universities. The degrees are bachelor, master, and doctor; as, bachelor of arts, divinity, or laws; master of arts; master in surgery; doctor of divinity, laws, medicine, &c. &c.—By degrees, step by step; gradually; by little and little; by moderate advances.—To a degree, to an extreme; exceedingly; as, proud to a degree.

Degust† (dē-gust′), v.t. [L. degusto, to taste—de, and gusto, to taste.] To taste.

Degustation (dē-gust-ā′shon), n. [L. degustatio, degustationis, a tasting—degusto, degustatum. See DEGUST.] A tasting.

Dehisce (dē-his′), v.i. [L. dehisco, to gape—de, intens., and hisco, to gape.] To gape. In bot. to open, as the capsules of plants.

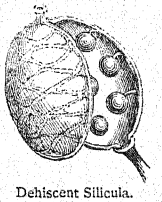
Dehiscence (dē-his′ens), n. 1. A gaping.—2. In bot. the separating into regular parts, or splitting of an organ in accordance with its structure, as the opening of the parts of a capsule or the cells of anthers, &c.



Dehiscent Silicula.

Dehiscent (dē-his′-ent), a. [L. dehiscens, dehiscentis, ppr. of dehisco, to gape. See DEHISCE.] Opening, as the capsule of a plant.

Dehonestate† (dē-hon-es′tāt), v.t. [L. dehonesto, dehonestatum, to disgrace—de, and honesto, to honour. See HONEST.] To disgrace. Jer. Taylor.

Dehonestation† (dē-hon′es-tā″shon), n. A disgracing; dishonouring. Bp. Gauden.

Dehors (dē-hor′). [Fr.] In law, without; out of; foreign to; irrelevant.

Dehort† (dē-hort′), v.t. [L. dehortor, to dissuade—de, and hortor, to advise.] To dissuade; to advise to the contrary; to counsel not to do or not to undertake.

> The apostles vehemently dehort us from unbelief. Bp. Ward.
> 'Exhort' remains, but 'dehort,' whose place neither 'dissuade' nor any other exactly supplies, has escaped us. Trench.

Dehortation (dē-hort-ā′shon), n. Dissuasion; advice or counsel against something. 'Dehortation from vice.' Knight.

The distribution of letters, &c., from a post-office to a district or districts; as, there are three deliveries every day.—5. Utterance; pronunciation, or manner of speaking.

I was charmed with the gracefulness of his figure and delivery. Addison.

6. Childbirth. Is. xxvi. 17.—7. † Free motion or use of the limbs; activity; agility.

The duke had the neater limbs, and freer delivery. Wotton.

—Delivery of a deed, the giving of a deed into the hands of the proper party. Delivery is requisite to a valid deed; it is given by the party himself, or his certain attorney, and expressed in the attestation, 'signed, sealed, and delivered.' In the case of certain deeds, as those which contain a clause dispensing with delivery, testamentary writings, bonds and other writings by parents in favour of their children, a deed in which the granter himself has an interest, or mutual obligation or contract between two or more parties, delivery is not required.

Dell (del), n. [See DALE.] A small narrow valley between hills: a ravine. 'Splinter'd crags that wall the dell.' Tennyson.

Dell † (del), n. A young girl; a virgin; a wench. 'Sweet doxies and dells.' B. Jonson. [Old cant.]

Della Crusca (del'la krus'ka). [It. della, of the, and crusca, bran.] The name of an academy founded at Florence in 1582, mainly for promoting the purity of the Italian language.

Della-cruscan (del'la-krus'kan), a. An epithet applied to a school of English poetry started by some Englishmen at Florence towards the end of the eighteenth century, whose silly sentimentalities and affectations created quite a furor in England for some time. It was extinguished by the bitter satire of Gifford's Baviad and Maviad.

Deloul (de-löl'), n. [Ar.] A dromedary. Layard.

Delph. See DELF.

Delphian, Delphic (del'fi-an, del'fik), a. 1. Relating to Delphi, a town of Phocis in Greece, and to the celebrated oracle of that place.

The Delphian vales, the Palestines,
The Meccas of the mind. Halleck.

2. Of or pertaining to the priestess of the oracle of Delphi, who in a state of inspiration delivered the responses of the oracle; hence, inspired. [Poetical.]

For still with Delphic emphasis she spann'd
The quick invisible strings. Keats.

Delphin, Delphinian (del'fin, del-fin'i-an), a. Same as Delphine (which see).

Delphin (del'fin), n. A neutral fat found in the oil of several members of the genus Delphinus.

Delphinaptera (del-fin-ap'tė-ra), n. [Gr. delphis, delphinos, a dolphin, and apteros, unwinged, unfinned—a, priv., and pteron, a wing, a fin.] A genus of cetaceans, of the family Delphinidæ, characterized, like the Beluga, by the want of a dorsal fin, but differing in having its snout prolonged into a sort of beak. It includes the right whale-porpoise, or D. Peronii, the D. Commersonii, and D. borealis—the two former inhabiting seas of high southern latitudes and the latter the North Pacific. Generally the species are about 5 to 6 feet long.

Delphinate (del'fin-āt), n. A salt formed by the union of delphinic acid with a base.

Delphine (del'fin), a. [L. delphinus, a dolphin.] 1. Pertaining to the dolphin, a genus of fishes.—2. Pertaining to the Dauphin of France; published for the use of the dauphin.—Delphine editions of the classics, a set of Latin classics prepared by thirty-nine scholars under the superintendence of Montausier, Bossuet, and Huet, for the use (in usum Delphini) of the son of Louis XIV., called the Grand Dauphin. They are not now valued except for their Indices Verborum.

Delphinic (del-fin'ik), a. The term applied to an acid discovered by Chevreul, first in dolphin-oil and afterwards in the ripe berries of the Guelder rose. It is now known to be identical with valeric acid.

Delphinidæ (del-fin'i-dē), n. pl. The dolphin tribe, a family of cetaceous animals, characterized by the moderate size of the head, by the presence of teeth in both jaws, and by a dorsal fin. Along with the dolphin and porpoise it includes many animals which are ordinarily called whales, a considerable number of which occasionally visit the northern coasts of Britain.

Delphinin, Delphinia (del'fin-in or del'fin-ēn, del-fin'i-a), n. A vegetable alkaloid discovered in the Delphinium Staphysagria. Its taste is bitter and acrid. When heated it melts, but on cooling becomes hard and brittle like resin. It is analogous in its characters to veratrine, and has been used as a substitute for it in nervous affections. Written also Delphinine, Delphine, &c.

Delphinium (del-fin'i-um), n. [Gr. delphinion, larkspur.] The larkspur genus, an extensive genus of the nat. order Ranunculaceæ, consisting of annual or perennial herbaceous plants, with flowers of a blue, purple, or white colour. The flowers are in loose racemes, and consist of five coloured sepals, the upper one having a long spur, and four inconspicuous petals. The species are scattered over the northern temperate regions of the globe. Many are cultivated in gardens under the name of larkspurs. One species, the D. Staphysagria, commonly called stavesacre, yields the vegetable alkaloid delphinia.

Delphinorhynchus (del-fī'nō-ring"kus), n. [Gr. delphis, delphinos, a dolphin, and rhynchos, a snout.] A genus of cetaceans, family Delphinidæ, having, like the true dolphins, one dorsal fin, but no furrow between the beak and forehead. D. coronatus, the largest species, from 30 to 36 feet long, frequents the Spitzbergen Sea. Species about 8 feet long have been cast ashore on the west coast of France.

Delphinus (del-fin'us), n. The dolphin, a genus of Mammalia, belonging to the order Cetacea. See DOLPHIN.

Delta (del'ta), n. The name of the Greek letter Δ, answering to the English D. The island formed by the alluvial deposits between the mouths of the Nile, from its resemblance to this letter, was named Delta by the Greeks; and the same name has since been extended to those alluvial tracts at the mouths of great rivers which, like the Nile, empty themselves into the sea by two or more diverging branches.

Deltafication (del'ta-fi-kā"shon), n. [Gr. delta, and L. facio, to make.] The act or process of forming a delta at the mouth of a river.

Deltaic (del-tā'ik), a. Relating to or like a delta. Dr. W. W. Hunter.

Deltidium (del-ti'di-um), n. [Gr. delta, and eidos, resemblance.] In zool. the triangular space between the beak and the hinge-bone of brachiopod shells. It is usually covered in by a shelly plate.

Deltoid (del'toid), a. [Gr. delta, the letter Δ, and eidos, form.] Resembling the Greek Δ; triangular; specifically, (a) in anat. an epithet applied to a muscle of the shoulder which moves the arm forward, upward, and backward. (b) In bot. triangular or trowel-shaped; as, a deltoid leaf; more specifically applied to the cross section of a solid.

Deltoid Leaf.

Deltoid (del'toid), n. In anat. the deltoid muscle.

Delubrum (dē-lū'brum), n. [L. deluo, to wash off—de, off, and luo, to wash.] 1. In Rom. antig. a temple having a basin or font, where persons coming to sacrifice washed. —2. In eccles. arch. a church furnished with a font.—3. A font or baptismal basin.

Deludable (dē-lūd'a-bl), a. [See DELUDE.] That may be deluded or deceived; liable to be imposed on. Sir T. Browne. [Rare.]

Delude (dē-lūd'), v.t. pret. & pp. deluded; ppr. deluding. [L. deludo, to deceive—de, and ludo, to play, to make sport or game of, to mock.] 1. To deceive; to impose on; to lead from truth or into error; to mislead the mind or judgment; to beguile; to cheat; as, an artful man deludes his followers; we are often deluded by false appearances. 'To delude the nation by an airy phantom.' Burke.—2.† To frustrate or disappoint; to elude. 'It deludes thy search?' Dryden.

This pure metal
So innocent is, and faithful to the mistress
Or master that possesses it, that, rather Than hold one drop that's venomous, of itself
It flies in pieces and deludes the traitor. Massinger.

—Mislead, Delude. See under MISLEAD.—SYN. To deceive, beguile, lead astray, cheat, impose upon, disappoint, frustrate.

Deluder (dē-lūd'ér), n. One who deceives; a deceiver; an impostor; one who holds out false pretences.

Deluge (del'ūj), n. [Fr. déluge; L. diluvium, a flood, a deluge—di for dis, asunder, away, and luo=lavo, to wash.] 1. Any overflowing of water; an inundation; a flood; but specifically, the great flood or overflowing of the earth by water in the days of Noah.—2. Anything resembling an inundation; anything that overwhelms, as a great calamity. 'A fiery deluge.' Milton.—After me the deluge, a saying generally ascribed to Prince Metternich, and meaning, 'After I am dead, let ruin come, I care not.' In reality it is due to Mdme. Pompadour, who laughed off all the remonstrances of ministers at her extravagance by saying, 'Après nous le déluge.' SYN. Flood, inundation.

Deluge (del'ūj), v.t. pret. & pp. deluged; ppr. deluging. 1. To overflow, as with water; to inundate; to drown; as, the waters deluged the earth, and destroyed the old world.—2. To overwhelm; to cover with any flowing or moving, spreading body; as, the northern nations deluged the Roman Empire with their armies.—3. To overwhelm; to cause to sink under the weight of a general or spreading calamity.

At length corruption, like a general flood Shall deluge all. Pope.

Deluge (del'ūj), v.i. To suffer a deluge; to be deluged.

I'd weep the world to such a strain,
That it should deluge once again.
Marquis of Montrose.

Delundung (de-lun'dung), n. The native name of Prionodon gracilis, a pretty quadruped inhabiting Java and Malacca, allied to the civets (Viverridæ), but probably forming a connecting link between them and the Felidæ, being destitute of scent-pouches. It is of slender form, with a long cylindrical tail, and is beautifully spotted.

Delusion (dē-lū'zhon), n. [L. delusio, delusionis, a deceiving, from deludo, delusum. See DELUDE.] 1. The act of deluding; deception; a misleading of the mind.

The major's good judgment—that is, if a man may be said to have good judgment who is under the influence of love's delusion. Thackeray.

2. False impression or belief; illusion; error or mistake proceeding from false views.

And fondly mourn'd the dear delusion gone.
Prior.

3. The state of being deluded or misled.—Delusion, Illusion. Illusion is an unreal appearance presented to the view bodily or mental. It is objective or external to the mind. Delusion, as an abstract noun, expresses the mental condition of the person who puts faith in illusions; as a concrete noun, it is a mental error or deception, and may have regard to things actually existing as well as to illusions. It may arise from ignorance, imperfect information, early prejudice, and the like. Illusions are the offspring of the imagination; delusions, of a perverted understanding. We speak of the illusions of fancy, hope, youth, and the like, but of the delusions of a fanatic or lunatic.—SYN. Illusion, deceit, cheat, fraud, falsehood, fallacy, guile, error, treachery.

Delusive (dē-lū'siv), a. Apt to deceive; tending to mislead the mind; deceptive; beguiling; as, delusive arts; delusive appearances. 'A delusive dream.' Sherburne.

Delusively (dē-lū'siv-li), adv. In a delusive manner.

Delusiveness (dē-lū'siv-nes), n. The quality of being delusive; tendency to deceive.

Delusory (dē-lū'so-ri), a. Apt to deceive; deceptive. 'Delusory, false pretences.' Prynne.

Deluvy,† n. [L. diluvium, a deluge.] Deluge. Chaucer.

Delve (delv), v.t. pret. & pp. delved; ppr. delving; old pret. dolve; old pp. dolven. [A. Sax. delfan. Cog. D. delven, to dig. It is probably connected with dell, a dale, D. delle, a valley or hollow, and Fris. dollen, to dig.] 1. To dig; to turn up with a spade. Delve of convenient depth your thrashing-floor.
Dryden.

2. To fathom; to trace out; to penetrate.

I cannot delve him to the root [I cannot trace his genealogy]. Shak.

Delve (delv), v.i. To dig; to labour with the spade.

When Adam dolve and Eve span,
Who was then the gentleman? Old rhyme.

Delve† (delv), n. A place dug; a pit-fall; a ditch; a den; a cave.

Guyon finds Mammon in a delve,
Sunning his treasure. Spenser.

—Delve of coals, a certain quantity of coals dug from the mine. [Provincial.]

Delver (delv'ér), n. One who digs, as with a spade.

Careful robins eye the delver's toil. Tennyson.

Demagnetization (dē-mag'net-iz-ā"shon), n. The act or process of depriving of magnetic, or of mesmeric, influence.

Demagnetize (dē-mag'net-īz), v.t. [L. de, priv., and magnetize.] To deprive of magnetic polarity; to restore from a sleep-walking state.

Demagogic, Demagogical (dem-a-goj'ik, dem-a-goj'ik-al), a. Relating to or like a demagogue; factious.

Demagogism, Demagogueism (dem'a-goj-izm, dem'a-gog-izm), n. The practices and principles of a demagogue.

Demagogue (dem'a-gog), n. [Gr. dēmagōgos—dēmos, the people, and agōgos, a leader, from agō, to lead.] 1. A leader of the people; a person who sways the people by his oratory.

Demosthenes and Cicero, though each of them a leader, or, as the Greeks called it, a demagogue, in a popular state, yet seem to differ in their practice.
Swift.

2. An unprincipled factious orator; one who acquires influence with the populace by pandering to their prejudices or playing on their ignorance; specifically, one who uses his influence with the lower classes to rouse them against the upper, or against the established form of government.

A plausible insignificant word, in the mouth of an expert demagogue, is a dangerous and deceitful weapon. South.

Demagogy (dem'a-goj-i), n. Same as Demagogism.

Demain, n. See DEMESNE.

Demaine,† v.t. [Fr.] To manage.

Is it not a great mischaunce,
To let a foole have governaunce
Of things that he cannot demaine? Chaucer.

Demaine,† n. Management. Chaucer.

Demand (dē-mand'), v.t. [Fr. demander, from L. demando, in its late sense of to demand, the opposite of mando, to commit to —lit. to put into one's hand, manus, the hand, and do, to give.] 1. To ask or call for, as one who has a claim or right to receive what is sought; to claim or seek as due by right; as, a creditor demands payment; parents demand obedience.

This pound of flesh, which I demand of him,
Is dearly bought; 'tis mine, and I will have it. Shak.

2. To ask or require; to claim without notion of right or authority; as, what price do you demand?

Establish him in his true sense again,
And I will please you what you will demand. Shak.

3. To ask by authority; to question authoritatively.

The officers of the children of Israel . . . were beaten, and demanded, Wherefore have ye not fulfilled your task in making brick? Ex. v. 14.

I Pandulph . . . religiously demand
Why thou against the Church, our holy mother,
So wilfully dost spurn? Shak.

4.† To ask; to question: without the notion of authority. Shak.; Goldsmith.—5. To sue for; to seek to obtain by legal process; as, the plaintiff in his action demands unreasonable damages.—6. To necessitate; to require as necessary or useful; as, the execution of this work demands great industry and care.—Ask, Demand, Claim, &c. See under ASK.

Demand (dē-mand'), v.i. To make a demand; to inquire peremptorily; to ask.

The soldiers likewise demanded of him, saying, And what shall we do? Luke iii. 14.

Demand (dē-mand'), n. 1. An asking for or claim made by virtue of a right or supposed right to the thing sought; an asking with authority; a challenging as due; a request made with authority; as, the demand of the creditor was reasonable.

He that has confidence to turn his wishes into demands, will be but a little way from thinking he ought to obtain them. Locke.

Should your greatness, and the care
That yokes with empire, yield you time
To make demand of modern rhyme. Tennyson.

2. The asking or requiring of a price for goods offered for sale; as, I cannot agree to his demand.—3. That which is or may be claimed as due; debt; as, what are your demands on the estate?—4. Earnest inquiry; question; interrogation.

The good Anchises raised him with his hand,
Who, thus encouraged, answered our demand.
Dryden.

5. The calling for in order to purchase; desire to possess.

In 1678 came forth a second edition (of the Pilgrim's Progress) with additions, and then the demand became immense. Macaulay.

6. In law, the asking or seeking for what is due or claimed as due, either expressly by words, or by implication, as by seizure of goods or entry into lands.—Demand and supply, terms used in pol. econ. to express the relations between consumption and production; between the demand of purchasers and the supply of commodities by those who have them to sell. The relations which subsist between the demand for an article and its supply determine its price or exchangeable value. When the demand for a commodity exceeds the supply the price of the commodity is raised, and when the supply exceeds the demand the price falls.—In demand, in request; much sought after or courted; as, these goods are in demand; the company of this gentleman is in great demand.—On demand, on being claimed; on presentation; as, a bill payable on demand.

Demandable (dē-mand'a-bl), a. That may be demanded, claimed, asked for, or required; as, payment is demandable at the expiration of the credit.

Demandant (dē-mand'ant), n. In law, one who demands; the plaintiff in a real action; any plaintiff.

Demander (dē-mand'ér), n. One who demands; one who requires with authority; one who claims as due; one who asks; one who seeks to obtain.

Demarcation, Demarkation (dē-märk-ā'shon), n. [Fr. démarcation—de, down, and marquer, to mark. See MARK.] The act or process of marking off, or of defining the limits or boundaries of anything; separation; distinction.

The speculative line of demarcation, where obedience ought to end and resistance must begin, is faint, obscure, and not easily definable. Burke.

Demarch† (dē-märch'), n. [Fr. démarche, gait.] March; walk; gait; excursion.

Imagination enlivens reason in its most extravagant demarches. London Journal, 1721.

Demarch (dēm'ärk), n. [Gr. dēmarchos—dēmos, a district, and archō, to rule.] The ruler or magistrate of a deme; the mayor of a modern Greek town.

Demarkation. See DEMARCATION.

Dematerialize (dē-ma-tē'ri-al-iz), v.t. To divest of material qualities or characteristics. 'Dematerializing matter by stripping it of everything which . . . has distinguished matter.' Milman.

Dematiei (dē'mat-i-ē''i), n. pl. [Gr. demation, a little bundle, from dema, dematos, a bundle.] A natural order of filamentous moulds, growing on the dry part of plants, distinguished from the white or brightly coloured species by dark threads, which look as if they were smoke-dried. The spores are mostly septate, and attached to the rigid, thick-walled filaments.

Demayne† (dē-mān'), n. Demeanour; appearance. 'Sorrowful demayne.' Spenser.

Deme† (dēm), v.t. To deem; to judge. Chaucer.

Deme (dēm), n. [Gr. dēmos, a district.] A subdivision of ancient Attica and of modern Greece; a township. 'The eponymous hero of a deme in Attica.' Grote.

Demean (dē-mēn'), v.t. [Fr. démener: se démener, which now means to kick and struggle, formerly meant to behave or conduct one's self—de, intens., and mener, to lead; to manage; It. menare, to lead, drive; L. minare, to drive with threats, from minari, to threaten, from mina, a threat.] 1. To behave; to carry; to conduct: with the reciprocal pronoun; as, it is our duty to demean ourselves with humility.

Strephon had long perplex'd his brains,
How with so high a nymph he might Demean himself the marriage-night. Swift.

2.† To treat; to conduct; to manage.

Our obdurate clergy have with violence demeaned the matter. Milton.

Demean (dē-mēn'), v.t. [L. de, and E. mean.] To debase; to lower.

Her son would demean himself by a marriage with an artist's daughter. Thackeray.

Demean† (dē-mēn'), n. 1. Mien; demeanour; behaviour; conduct. 'Grave demean and solemn vanity.' West.—2. Conduct; management; treatment.

All the vile demeane and usage bad
With which he had these two so ill bestad.
Spenser.

Dementedness (dē-ment'ed-nes), n. The state of being demented.

It is named by Pinel dementia or démence, dementedness. Pritchard.

Dementia (dē-men'shi-a), n. [L., from demens, dementis, out of one's mind—de, out of, and mens, the mind.] 1. A form of insanity in which unconnected and imperfectly defined ideas chase each other rapidly through the mind; the powers of continued attention and of reflection are lost, and even the perceptive power at length becomes indistinct. It sometimes accompanies old age. It may be temporary or permanent.—2. Absence of intellect; idiotcy.

Demephitization (dē-mef'it-iz-ā''shon), n. [See DEMEPHITIZE.] The act of purifying from mephitic or foul air.

Demephitize (dē-mef'it-iz), v.t. pret. & pp. demephitized; ppr. demephitizing. [Prefix de, priv., and mephitis, foul air or ill smell.] To purify from foul unwholesome air.

Demerge† (dē-mėrj'), v.t. [L. demergo, demersum, to plunge into—de, down, and mergo, to plunge.] To sink or dip into; to immerse. 'The water in which it was demerged.' Boyle.

Demerit (de-me'rit), n. [Fr. démérite—de, and mérite, merit, L. meritum, from mereo, to earn or deserve. The Latin demereo is used in a good sense. See MERIT.] 1.† That which one merits, good or bad; desert.

By many benefits and demerits whereby they obliged their adherents, (they) acquired this reputation. Holland.

2. That which deserves punishment: the opposite of merit; that which is blamable or punishable in moral conduct; vice or crime.

Mine is the merit, the demerit thine. Dryden.

Demerit† (dē-me'rit), v.t. 1. To deserve: either in a good or bad sense. 'If I have demerited any praise or blame.' Udall. 'Executed as a traitor . . . as he well demerited.' State Trials.—2. To cry down or lower the merit of; to depreciate.

Faith by her own dignity and worthiness doth not demerit justice and righteousness. Bp. Woolton.

Demerit† (dē-me'rit), v.i. To deserve praise or censure.

Demerse† (dē-mėrs'), v.t. [See DEMERGE.] To plunge down into; to immerse.

The orifice of the tube will be found demersed in it. Boyle.

Demersed (dē-mėrst'), a. In bot. situated or growing under water: applied to such leaves of plants as grow under water.

Demersion (dē-mėr'shon), n. [L. demersio, demersionis, from demergo. See DEMERGE.] 1. A plunging into a fluid; a drowning.—2. The state of being overwhelmed. 'The sinking and demersion of buildings into the earth.' Ray. [In both its uses rare or obsolete.]

Demesne, Demain (de-mēn', de-mān'), n. [O.Fr. demaine, domaine, from L. dominium, right of ownership, from dominus, a lord.] 1. A manor-house and the land adjacent or near, which a lord keeps in his own hands or immediate occupation, for the use of his family, as distinguished from his tenemental lands, distributed among his tenants, called book-land, or charter-land, and folk-land, or estates held in villenage, from which sprang copyhold estates. Copyhold estates, however, have been accounted demesnes, because the tenants are judged to have their estates only at the will of the lord.

The defects in those acts . . . have hitherto been wholly ineffectual, except about the demesnes of a few gentlemen. Swift.

2. Any estate in land.

A gentleman of noble parentage,
Of fair demesnes, youthful, and nobly allied. Shak.

—Demesne lands, lands which the lord has not let out in tenancy, but has reserved for his own use and occupation.

The demesne lands of the crown . . . were abundantly sufficient to support its dignity and magnificence. Hallam.

3. To have or to state scruples or difficulties; to object hesitatingly; to take exceptions; as, they demurred to our proposals.—4. In law, to stop at any point in the pleadings, and rest or abide on that point in law for a decision of the cause; as, the defendant may demur to the plaintiff's declaration, alleging it to be insufficient in law; the plaintiff may demur to the defendant's plea for a like reason.—SYN. To pause, doubt, hesitate, object.

Demur† (dē-mėr'), v.t. 1. To doubt of; to scruple; to hesitate about; as, to demur obedience. Fenton.

The latter I demur; for in their looks Much reason, and in their actions oft appears.
Milton.

2. To put off; to keep in a state of delay.

He demands a fee,
And then demurs me with a vain delay. Quarles.

Demur (dē-mėr'), n. 1. Stop; pause; hesitation as to the propriety of proceeding; suspense of proceeding or decision.

Works adjourned have many stays,
Long demurs breed new delays. Southwell.

2. Exception taken; objection stated.

All my demurs but double his attacks. Pope.
He yielded, wroth and red, with fierce demur.
Tennyson.

Demure (dē-mūr'), a. [From Fr. de mœurs, of manners, having manners, from L. mores, manners. Wedgwood and others incline to derive it from Fr. mûr, mature, staid, from L. maturus, ripe.] 1. Sober; grave; modest; downcast; as, a demure abasing of the eye.

With countenance demure and modest grace.
Spenser.

2. Affectedly modest; making a show of gravity or decorousness. [This is the sense in which the word is now chiefly used.]

The demure parlour-maid, as she handed the dishes and changed the plates, saw that all was not right, and was more demure than ever. Trollope.

Demure† (dē-mūr'), v.i. To look with a grave countenance.

Your wife, Octavia, with her modest eyes, ...
Demuring upon me. Shak.

Demurely (dē-mūr'li), adv. With a grave, solemn countenance; with a fixed look; with a show of solemn gravity.

Esop's damsel sat demurely at the board's end.
Bacon.

Demureness (dē-mūr'nes), n. The state of being demure; gravity of countenance real or affected; a show of modesty.

Demurity (dē-mūr'i-ti), n. 1. Demureness. 2. An impersonation of demureness; one who acts demurely.

She will act after the fashion of Richardson's demurities. Lamb.

Demurrable (dē-mu'ra-bl), a. That may be demurred to; that exception may be taken to.

Demurrage (dē-mu'rāj), n. [See DEMUR.] In maritime law, (a) the time during which a vessel is detained by the freighter beyond that originally stipulated, in loading or unloading. When a vessel is thus detained she is said to be on demurrage. (b) The compensation which the freighter has to pay for such delay or detention. Demurrage must be paid though it be proved the delay is inevitable; but it cannot be claimed where it arises from detention by an enemy, tempestuous weather, or through the fault of the owner, captain, or crew. The term is applied also to detention of railway waggons, &c.

Demurrer (dē-mu'rėr), n. 1. One who demurs.—2. In law, a stop at some point in the pleadings, and a resting of the decision of the cause on that point; an issue on matter of law. A demurrer confesses the fact or facts to be true, but denies the sufficiency of the facts in point of law to support the claim or defence. A demurrer may be tendered to the declaration, to the plea, to the replication, to the rejoinder, &c. A demurrer is either general or special, the former being for some defect in substance, the latter for some defect in form.

Demus (dē'mus), n. See DEME, n.

Demy (dē-mī'), n. [Fr. demi, half.] 1. A particular size of paper; a size of paper intervening between royal and crown. Printing demy measures generally 22 inches by 17½, writing 20 inches by 15½, drawing 22 inches by 17.—2. A kind of scholar or exhibitioner at Magdalen College, Oxford.

He was elected into Magdalen College as a demy; a term by which that society denominates those which are elsewhere called 'scholars,' young men, who partake of the founder's benefaction, and succeed in their order to vacant fellowships. Johnson.

Demy (dē-mī'), a. Indicating a kind of paper, in size between royal and crown. See the noun.

Den (den), n. [The A. Sax. has this word in several forms: denn means chiefly a bed, cave, lurking-place; den, denu, dene, a plain, a valley, a den. See DENE.] 1. A cave or hollow place in the earth: usually applied to a cave, pit, or subterraneous recess, used for concealment, shelter, protection, or security; as, a lion's den.

The beasts go into dens. Job xxxvii. 8.
The children of Israel made them the dens, which are in the mountains. Judg. vi. 2.

2, Any squalid place of resort or residence; a haunt: used always in a bad sense; as, dens of misery. 'Those squalid dens . . . the reproach of large capitals.' Macaulay. 3. A narrow glen; a gulley; a dell. 'The dowie dens o' Yarrow.' Old ballad. [Scotch.] In this sense it is used in England as well as in Scotland as an element in place-names; as, Hamp*den*, Cliev*eden*, Hawthorn*den*.

Den (den), v.i. To dwell as in a den. 'Sluggish salvages that den below.' Fletcher.

God ye good den, fair gentlewoman. Shak.

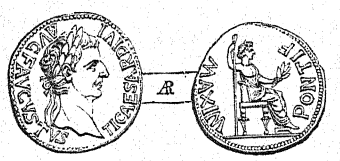
Denariate† (dē-nā'ri-āt), n. [See DENARIUS.] As much land as is worth one penny per annum.

Denarius (dē-nā'ri-us), n. [L., from deni, for decni, by tens, ten each—decem, ten.] A Roman silver coin worth 10 asses or 10 lbs. of copper originally, and afterwards considered equal to 16 asses, when the weight of the as was reduced to an ounce on account of the scarcity of silver. The denarius was equivalent to about 7½*d.* English money. There was also a gold denarius equal in value to 25 silver ones.



Denarius of Tiberius Cæsar.

Denary (de'na-ri), a. [L. denarius. See DENARIUS.] Containing ten; tenfold.

Denary (de'na-ri), n. The number ten.

Denationalization (dē-na'shon-al-iz-ā"-shon), n. The act of denationalizing; the condition of being denationalized.

Denationalize (dē-na'shon-al-īz), v.t. pret. & pp. denationalized; ppr. denationalizing. [Prefix de, and nation.] To divest of national character or rights by transference to the service of another nation.

A ship built and registered in the United States is denationalized by being employed in the service of another nation and bearing its flag. Goodrich.

Denaturalize (dē-na'tūr-al-īz), v.t. pret. & pp. denaturalized; ppr. denaturalizing. [Prefix de, and naturalize.] 1. To render unnatural; to alienate from nature.—2. To deprive of naturalization or acquired citizenship in a foreign country.—To denaturalize one's self, to renounce one's rights and duties as a citizen; to denationalize one's self.

They also claimed the privilege, when aggrieved, of denaturalizing themselves, or, in other words, of publicly renouncing their allegiance to their sovereign, and of enlisting under the banners of his enemy. Prescott.

Denaturate† (dē-na'tūr-āt), v.t. To render unnatural; to denaturalize; to deprive of natural qualities.

Denay† (dē-nā'), n. Denial; refusal.

My love can give no place, bide no denay. Shak.

Denay† (dē-nā'), v.t. To deny.

Let not wonted fealty be denayed. Old play.

Dendrachate (den'dra-kāt), n. [Gr. dendron, a tree, and achatēs, agate.] Arborescent or dendritic agate; agate containing the figures of shrubs or parts of plants. See DENDRITE.

Dendral (den'dral), a. [From Gr. dendron, a tree.] Pertaining to a tree or trees; of the nature of a tree; dendritic; arboreal. [Rare.]

Dendranatomy (den'dra-nat-o-mi), n. [Gr. dendron, a tree, and E. anatomy.] The anatomy of trees. [Rare.]

Dendraspidæ (den-dras'pi-dē), n. pl. [Gr. dendron, a tree, aspis, aspidos, a viper, and eidos, resemblance.] A family of South African snakes, characterized by the possession of very long poisonous fangs, perforated, and permanently erect. The best known species is Dendraspis angusticeps, or narrow-headed Dendraspis, about 6 feet long, slender, and a good climber. Its colour is olive-brown washed with green.

Dendrerpeton (den-drėr'pē-ton), n. [Gr. dendron, a tree, and herpeton, a reptile, from herpō, to creep.] A genus of fossil amphibians, whose character was determined from some teeth and small bones found in the cavity of a sigillaria from the coal strata of Nova Scotia.

Dendriform (den'dri-form), a. [Gr. dendron, a tree, and L. forma, form.] Having the form or appearance of a tree.

Dendrite (den'drīt), n. [Gr. dendron, a tree.] A stone or mineral, on or in which are figures resembling shrubs, trees, or mosses. The appearance is due to arborescent crystallization, resembling the frost-work on our windows. The figures generally appear on the surfaces of fissures, and in joints in rocks, and are attributable to the presence of the hydrous oxide of manganese, which generally assumes such a form.

Dendritic, Dendritical (den-drit'ik, den-drit'ik-al), a. 1. Resembling a tree; tree-like. Owen.—2. Marked by figures resembling shrubs, moss, &c.: said of minerals. See DENDRITE.

Dendrobium (den-drō'bi-um), n. [Gr. dendron, a tree, and bios, life.] An extensive genus of epiphytes, dispersed over the whole of the damp tropical parts of Asia; nat. order Orchidaceæ. The species are very numerous, varying extremely in habit, some being little larger than the mosses among which they grow, while others are surpassed in stature by few of the order. Upwards of eighty species have been cultivated in hothouses for the beauty of their flowers.

Dendrobium (Dendrobium Falconeri).

Dendrocœla (den-drō-sē'la), n. pl. [Gr. dendron, a tree, and koilos, hollow.] A section of Scolecida belonging to the sub-order Planarida. See PLANARIDA.

Dendrocolaptes (den'drō-kō-lap"tēz), n. pl. [Gr. dendron, a tree, and kolaptō, to peck with the bill.] The hook-billed creepers, a genus of tenuirostral birds, with the bill generally long and curved. There are several species natives of South America.

Dendrocolaptinæ (den'drō-kō-lap-ti"nē), n. pl. A sub-family of American passerine birds allied to the Certhidæ. See DENDROCOLAPTES.

Dendrodentine (den'drō-den-tin), n. [Gr. dendron, a tree, and E. dentine.] A term applied to that modification of the fundamental tissue of the teeth which is produced by the aggregation of many simple teeth into a mass, presenting by the blending of the dentine, enamel, and cement a dendritic appearance.

Dendrodont (den'drō-dont), n. [Gr. dendron, a tree, and odous, odontos, a tooth.] One of a fossil family of vertebrates, most probably reptiles, occurring in the old red sandstone near Elgin, so called from a section of the teeth presenting numerous fissures, radiating like the branches of a tree, consisting as yet of only one genus—Dendrodus. It is possible that the dendrodont may be only a species of labyrinthodont.

Dendrodus (den'drō-dus), n. The name provisionally given to a fossil genus of vertebrates. See DENDRODONT.

Dendrography (den-drog'ra-fi), n. [Gr. dendron, a tree, and graphō, to write.] The same as Dendrology.

Dendroid, Dendroidal (den'droid, den-droid'al), a. [Gr. dendron, a tree, and eidos, form.] Resembling a small tree or shrub.

Dendrolagus (den-drol'a-gus), n. [Gr. dendron, a tree, and lagōs, a hare.] The tree-kangaroo, a genus of marsupial animals belonging to the kangaroo family. Two species, D. ursinus and D. inustus, have been discovered in New Guinea.

Dendrolite (den'drol-īt), n. [Gr. dendron, a tree, and lithos, a stone.] A petrified or fossil shrub, plant, or part of a plant.

Dendrologist (den-drol'o-jist), n. One versed in dendrology.

Dendrology (den-drol'o-ji), n. [Gr. dendron, a tree, and logos, a discourse.] A discourse or treatise on trees; the natural history of trees.

Dendrometer (den-drom'et-ėr), n. [Gr. dendron, a tree, and metreō, to measure.] The name applied to an instrument of various forms for measuring the height and diameter of trees.

Dendromys (den'dro-mis), n. [Gr. dendron, a tree, and mys, a mouse.] A genus of rodent quadrupeds found in South Africa, which frequent the branches of trees, where they build their nests and bring forth their young. These animals belong to the family of mice. D. typus is the only species. It is about 3½ inches long, with a tail 4½ inches.

Dendrophis (den'dro-fis), n. [Gr. dendron, a tree, and ophis, a serpent.] A genus of serpents, family Colubridæ. The species have a line of wider scales along the back, and narrower scales along the flanks, but their head is not larger than their body, which is very slender and elongated. They are found in India and Africa, and are not venomous. They live chiefly among the branches of trees and feed on reptiles. By some naturalists they are raised into the family Dendrophidæ.

Dene (dēn), n. [A form of den. See DEN.] A dell or valley: often used as an ending of place-names; as, Deep*dene*, Hawthorn*dens* (Isle of Wight), &c.

Dene (dēn), n. A hillock; a form of dune (which see). 'Great banks and denes of shifting sand.' Kingsley. [Rare.]

Deneb (de'neb), n. [Ar.] The name of a bright star (β) in the tail of the Lion.

Denegate† (de-nē-gāt), v.t. [L. denego, denegatum. See DENY.] To deny.

Denegation† (de'nē-gā'shon), n. Denial.

Denelage,† n. [A. Sax. Dena lagu, law of the Danes.] The laws which the Danes enacted whilst they had the dominion of England.

Dengue (deng'gā), n. [A corruption of E. dandy, the name given to the fever in the West Indies, from the stiff and constrained action it imposed on the limbs; and mistaken by the Spaniards for their word dengue, prudery, which very well also agrees with stiffness or constraint. The Spanish term prevailed, and became the name of the disease.] A febrile epidemic disease, the symptoms of which resemble those that would accompany a mixture of scarlet fever and rheumatism.

Deniable (dē-nī'a-bl), a. [See DENY.] That may be denied or contradicted.

Denial (dē-nī'al), n. [See DENY.] 1. The act of denying, contradicting, refusing, or disowning. 'Hence with denial vain.' Milton. 2. An assertion that an affirmation or statement made is untrue; a negation; a contradiction. 'An entire denial of the miracles.' Trench.—3. Refusal to grant; the negation of a request or petition; the contrary to grant, allowance, or concession; as, his request or application met with a direct denial.—4. A rejection or refusing to acknowledge; a disowning; a refusing to receive or embrace; as, a denial of God; a denial of the faith or the truth.—Denial of one's self, a declining of some gratification; restraint of one's appetites or propensities.

Denichi, Denix (den'i-chē, den'iks), n. A Japanese idol with three heads and forty hands. The heads symbolize the sun, moon, and elements, and the forty hands the bounty of nature.

Denier (dē-nī'ėr), n. One who denies or contradicts; one who refuses or rejects; a disowner; one who does not own, avow, or acknowledge; as, a denier of a fact, or of the faith, or of Christ.

Denigrate† (de'ni-grāt), v.t. [L. denigro—de, and nigro, to blacken, from niger, black.] To blacken; to make black. Sir T. Browne.

Denim (den'im), n. A coarse cotton drilling used for overalls.

Denison (de'ni-zn), n. The same as Denizen.

Denitrate (dē-nī'trāt), v.t. To set nitric acid free from.

Denitration (dē-nī-trā'shon), n. A disengaging of nitric acid.

Denitrify (dē-nit'ri-fī), v.t. To deprive of nitre. 'Denitrified sulphuric acid.' Pop. Ency.

Denization (de-ni-zā'shon), n. [See DENIZEN.] The act of making one a denizen, subject, or citizen.

A vast number of charters of denization were granted to particular persons of Irish descent from the reign of Henry II. downwards, which gave them and their posterity the full birthrights of English subjects. Hallam.

Denize† (de-nīz'), v.t. To make a denizen, subject, or citizen of; to naturalize.

There was a private act made for denizing the children of Richard Hill. Strype.

Denizen (de'ni-zn), n. [The origin of this word has been disputed. Wedgwood, however, is no doubt right in taking it from O.Fr. deinzein, one living within a city, from deins, dens, Fr. dans, in, within, a contr. of L. de intus, from within, and thus opposed to foreign. 'In the Liber Albus of the city of London the Fr. deinzein, the original of the English word, is constantly opposed to foreign, applied to traders within and without the privileges of the city franchise respectively.' Wedgwood.] 1. In English law, an alien who is made a subject by the sovereign's letters patent, holding a middle state between an alien and a natural born subject. A denizen cannot sit in either house of parliament or hold any civil or military office of trust. Hence—2. A stranger admitted to residence and certain rights in a foreign country.

Ye gods,
Natives, or denizens, of blest abodes. Dryden.

3. A citizen; a dweller; an inhabitant. 'Denizens of air.' Pope.

Denizen (de'ni-zn), v.t. To make a denizen; to admit to residence with certain rights and privileges; to enfranchise.

Denizenship (de'ni-zn-ship), n. State of being a denizen.

Denk (dengk), a. Same as Dink. [Scotch.]

Dennet (den'net), n. A light, open, two-wheeled carriage for travelling, resembling a gig.

Denominable (dē-nom'in-a-bl), a. [See DENOMINATE.] That may be denominated or named. Sir T. Browne.

Denominate (dē-nom'in-āt), v.t. pret. & pp. denominated; ppr. denominating. [L. denomino—de, intens., and nomino, to name. See NAME.] To name; to give a name or epithet to; as, a race of intelligent beings denominated MAN; actions are denominated virtuous or vicious, according to their character.—SYN. To name, call, style, designate.

Denominate (dē-nom'in-āt), a. In arith. denoting a number which expresses the kind of unit treated of; qualifying: opposed to abstract; thus, seven pounds is a denominate number, while seven, without reference to concrete units, is abstract.

Denomination (dē-nom'in-ā"shon), n. 1. The act of naming.—2. A name or appellation; a vocal sound, customarily used to express a thing or a quality in discourse; as, all men fall under the denomination of sinners; actions fall under the denomination of good or bad.—3. A class, society, or collection of individuals, called by the same name; a sect; as, a denomination of Christians.

Denominational (dē-nom'in-ā"shon-al), a. Pertaining to or characterizing a denomination.

Their zeal was chiefly shown in the defence of their denominational differences. Buckle.

Denominationalism (dē'nom'in-ā"shon-alizm), n. The system of persons separating into different churches or denominations, in accordance with their distinctive religious opinions; a denominational or class spirit; adherence or devotion to a denomination.

We have 'inflexional,' 'seasonal,' 'denominational,' and, not content with this, in dissenting magazines at least, the monstrous birth, 'denominationalism.' Trench.

Denominationally (dē-nom'in-ā"shon-al-li), adv. By denomination or sect.

Denominative (dē-nom'in-āt-iv), a. 1. That gives a name; that confers a distinct appellation.

Connotative names have hence been also called denominative, because the subject which they denominate is denominated by, or receives a name from, the attribute which they connote. J. S. Mill.

2. That obtains a distinct name or appellation; that is distinctively designated.

The least denominative part of time is a minute. Cocker.

Denominative (dē-nom'in-āt-iv), n. That which has the character of a denomination; specifically, in gram. a verb formed from a noun either substantive or adjective.

Denominatively (dē-nom'in-āt-iv-li), adv. By denomination.

Denominator (dē-nom'in-āt-ėr), n. He who or that which gives a name; he from whom or that from which a name is derived.

Eber, the Father of the Hebrews, and denominator of the Hebrew tongue. Lightfoot.

Specifically, (a) in arith. that number placed below the line in vulgar fractions, which shows into how many parts the integer is divided. Thus in ⅘, 5 is the denominator, showing that the integer is divided into five parts; and the numerator 3 shows how many parts are taken, that is, three-fifths. (b) In alg. the expression in a fraction under the line signifying division.

In this sense the denominator is not necessarily a number, but may be any expression, either positive or negative, real or imaginary. Mat. Dict.

Denotable (dē-nōt'a-bl), a. That may be denoted or marked.

Denotate (dē-nōt'āt), v.t. To denote. 'These terms denotate a longer time.' Burton.

Denotation (dē-nō-tā'shon), n. [L. denotatio, a marking or pointing out, from denoto, denotatum. See DENOTE.] The act of denoting or marking off; separation; distinction, as by name. J. S. Mill.

Denotative (dē-nōt'a-tiv), a. Having power to denote.

What are the effects of sickness? The alteration it produces is so denotative, that a person is known to be sick by those who never saw him in health. Letters on Physiognomy.

'Tis not alone my inky cloak, good mother,
. . . . . .
That can denote me truly. Shak.

2. To be the sign or symptom of; to show; to indicate; as, a quick pulse denotes fever.—Note, Denote, Connote. See under CONNOTE.—SYN. To indicate, express, show, betoken, imply.

Denotement (dē-nōt'ment), n. Sign; indication. 'Close denotements working from the heart.' Shak.

Dénouement (de-nö-mäñ), n. [Fr., from dénouer, to untie—de, priv., and nouer, to tie; L. nodo.] A French term naturalized in England, and signifying the winding up or catastrophe of a plot, as of a novel, drama, &c.; the solution of any mystery; the issue, as of any course of conduct; the event.

A great dramatic poem, by the selection of its characters and of the actions and events that exhibit or develop them, . . . by the evolution of the plot, . . . by the gradual and natural movement of the action towards the denouement, compresses into brief compass a representation of the moral life of man. Dr. Caird.

Denounce (dē-nouns'), v.t. pret. & pp. denounced; ppr. denouncing. [Fr. dénoncer; L. denuntiare—de, down, and nuntiare, to tell, declare.] 1. To declare solemnly; to proclaim in a threatening manner; to announce or declare, as a threat.

I denounce unto you this day, that ye shall surely perish. Deut. xxx. 18.

So we say, to denounce war; to denounce wrath.—2. To threaten by some outward sign or expression.

His look denounced revenge. Milton.

3. To inform against; to accuse; as, to denounce one for neglect of duty. 'Denounced for a heretic.' Dr. H. More.

Denouncement (dē-nouns'ment), n. The declaration of a menace, or of evil; denunciation. Sir T. Browne.

Denouncer (dē-nouns'ėr), n. One who denounces, or declares a menace.

Here comes the sad denouncer of my fate. Dryden.

De novo (dē nō'vō). [L.] Anew; from the beginning.

Dense (dens), a. [Fr. dense; L. densus, thick.] 1. Close; compact; having its constituent parts closely united; thick; as, a dense body; dense air; a dense cloud or fog.—2. Crowded. [Rare.]

> The decks were dense with stately forms.
> Tennyson.

3. In bot. a term applied to a panicle which has an abundance of flowers very close.

Densely (dens'li), adv. In a dense manner; compactly.

Denseness (dens'nes), n. Density (which see).

Denshire (den'shēr), v.t. [Said to be contracted for Devonshire.] To improve land by casting parings of earth, turf, and stubble into heaps, which are burned into ashes for a compost. Wharton.

Density (dens'i-ti), n. [L. densitas, thickness, from densus, thick.] The quality of being dense, close, or compact; closeness of constituent parts; compactness. Density is opposed to rarity; and in physics the density of a body indicates the quantity of matter contained in it, under a given bulk. If a body of equal bulk with another is of double the density, it contains double the quantity of matter. Or if a body contain the same quantity of matter as another, but under a less bulk, its density is greater in proportion as its bulk is less than that of the other. Hence, the density is directly proportional to the quantity of matter, and inversely proportional to the bulk or magnitude. The relative quantities of matter in bodies are known by their gravity or weight, and when a body, mass, or quantity of matter is spoken of, its weight or gravity is always understood, that being the proper measure of the density or quantity of matter. The weights of different bodies, of equal bulks, indicate their relative densities.

Dent (dent), n. [A form of dint (which see).] 1.† A stroke; a blow.

> Show'd all his bodie bare unto the cruell dent.
> Spenser.

2. A mark made by a blow, as a gap or notch; especially, a hollow or depression made on the surface of a solid body; an indentation.

> The bullet, shot at the distance of 20 yards, made a very considerable dent in a door.
> History of the Royal Society.

Dent (dent), v.t. To make a dent or small hollow. See INDENT.

Dent (dent), n. [L. dens, dentis, a tooth.] A manufacturer's name for the tooth of a comb, metallic brush, or card; also, a cane or wire of the reed frame of a weaver's loom.

Dental (den'tal), a. [L. dentalis, dental, from dens, dentis, a tooth.] 1. Of or pertaining to the teeth.—2. In gram. formed or pronounced by the teeth, with the aid of the tongue; as, d and t are dental letters.—Dental formula, an arrangement of symbols and numbers used to signify the number and kinds of teeth of a mammiferous animal, and usually forming the main element in its generic character. Thus the dental formula of cats or the genus Felis is: I. $\frac{3-3}{3-3}$, C. $\frac{1-1}{1-1}$, P. M. $\frac{3-3}{2-2}$, M. $\frac{1-1}{1-1}=30$; which signifies that they have three incisors on each side of each jaw; one canine tooth on each side of both jaws; three præmolars or false molars on each side of the upper jaw, and two præmolars on each side of the lower jaw; and one true molar on each side of each jaw. The dental formula of man is: I. $\frac{2-2}{3-2}$, C. $\frac{1-1}{1-1}$, P. M. $\frac{2-2}{2-2}$, M. $\frac{3-3}{3-3}=32$.

Accumulator, n. [add.] 1. In elect. same as Condenser. The name is now especially applied to a kind of battery devised by M. Camille Faure, by means of which electric energy can be stored and rendered portable. Each battery forms a cylindrical leaden vessel, containing alternate sheets of metallic lead and minium wrapped in felt and rolled into a spiral wetted with acidulated water. On being charged with electricity the energy may be stored till required for use.—2. In hydraul. an apparatus used in connection with water-pressure machinery for the purpose of equalizing pressure or accumulating energy to be used intermittently, for short periods, at a number of different points. It consists of a tall vertical cylinder fitted with a solid ram loaded with weights necessary for the desired pressure. Water is forced into the cylinder by means of a pumping engine till the ram is at the top of its stroke, when a catch arrangement stops the engine. When water is taken to work machinery the ram of the accumulator descends, and the engine recommences work, and supplies the cylinder with a quantity of water equal to that expended.

Accuse (ak-kūz'), v.t. [add.] † To indicate; to evince; to show; to manifest. [A French idiom.]

> Amphialus answered . . . with such excusing himself that more and more accused his love to Philoclea. Sir P. Sydney.

Acetylene (a-set'i-lēn), n. [From acetyl.] A hydrocarbon (C_2H_2), a colourless gas which forms explosive compounds with certain metals (as copper and silver) and metallic salts, and also with air when in proportion of one volume to nine of air. It is now used as an illuminant, being easily made with calcium carbide and water.

Acholia (a-kō'li-a), n. [Gr. a, priv., and cholē, bile.] In pathol. want of bile; a deficiency of bile.

Acidic (a-sid'ik), a. 1. Pertaining to an acid; acid.—2. Containing a large amount of an acid constituent; as, an acidic rock, that is one containing a large amount of silica.

Acidific (as-id-if'ik), a. [From acidify.] Producing acidity or an acid; acidifying.

Acidulent (a-sid'ū-lent), a. [See ACIDULATE, ACIDULOUS.] Being somewhat acid or sour; cross; tart; peevish. 'Anxious acidulent face.' Carlyle.

Acierage (ā'sē-ėr-āj), n. [Fr. acier, steel.] A process by which an engraved copper-plate or an electrotype from an engraved plate of steel or copper has a film of iron deposited over its surface by electricity, in order to protect the engraving from wear in printing. By this means an electrotype of a fine engraving which, if printed directly from the copper, would not yield 500 good impressions, can be made to yield 3000 or more. Whenever the film of iron becomes so worn as to reveal any part of the copper underneath, it is removed and a fresh coating deposited; and in this way as many as 30,000 good impressions have been printed from the electrotype of a finely-engraved plate.

Acoustically (a-kous'tik-al-li). adv. In an acoustic manner; in relation to or in a manner adapted to acoustics. Prof. Tyndall.

Acreophagy. Same as Akreophagy.

Acritochromacy (ak'ri-to-krō''ma-si), n. [Gr. akritos, not distinguishing, and chrōma, colour.] Inability to distinguish accurately between colours; colour-blindness.

An instrument intended to reproduce sound waves, as those caused by the voice, with greater intensity by means of a vibrating diaphragm, a current of air or steam, and other devices. The human voice has been rendered audible at great distances by such an instrument.—2. An instrument to assist the hearing of deaf persons.

Aerophore (ā'ėr-ō-fōr), n. [Gr. aēr, air, and pherō, I carry.] A portable receptacle into which vitiated air may be breathed and purified by means of chemicals so that it may be breathed again; intended to be used under water, amid smoke, or in similar circumstances.

Aeroplane (ā'ėr-ō-plān), n. [Fr. aéroplane, fr. Gr. aeroplanos, wandering in air—aēr, air, and planē, a wandering.] A name for a flying-machine, especially for one constructed to fly on the principle of a kite.

Mr. Hiram S. Maxim, inventor of the well-known Maxim gun, has exhibited his experimental air-ship or flying-machine to the public; but although the apparatus is a decided step towards the practical solution of the problem of flight by means of mechanism, it is confessedly but a step. It is constructed on the aëroplane or kite principle, that is to say, a plane surface gliding through the atmosphere at a certain angle and speed and supported by the resistance of the air. The aëroplane in this case is 50 feet wide and 1400 square feet in surface, having side wings each 38 feet wide, &c.
Whitaker's Almanack for 1895.

Baccarat, Baccara (bak'ka-ra, bak-ka-rä'), n. [Fr., origin unknown.] A game of cards introduced from France into England and America. It is played by any number of players or rather bettors, and a banker. The latter opens the play by dealing two cards to each bettor, and two to himself, and covering the stakes of each individual with an equal sum. The cards are then examined, and those belonging to the bettors which when added score nine points, or nearest that number, take their own stake and the banker's. Should he, however, be nearest the winning number of points, he takes all the stakes on the table; in any case he takes the stakes of the players who have not scored so near the winning points as himself. Various other numbers, as 19, 29, 18, &c., give certain advantages in the game. Court cards count as ten points, the others according to the number of pips.

> I perceive that you and I are in a wrong box. J. Udall (1588).

Boycott (boi'kot), v.t. [From Captain Boycott, an Irish landlord, the first prominent victim of the system.] 1. To combine in refusing to work for, to buy from, or sell to, or in general to give assistance to, or have dealings with, on account of difference of opinion or the like in social or political matters: a word introduced under the auspices of the Land League in Ireland in 1880.

> Boycotting was not only used to punish evicting landlords and agents, tenants guilty of paying rent, and tradesmen who ventured to hold dealings with those against whom the League had pronounced its anathema; but the League was now strong enough to use this means as an instrument of extending its organization and filling its coffers. Shopkeepers who refused to join and subscribe received reason to believe that they would be deprived of their custom; recalcitrant farmers found themselves without a market for their crops and cattle.
> Annual Register (1880).

2. To combine in refusing to buy, sell, accept, deal in, or in any way countenance; as, to boycott a manufacturer's goods.

END OF VOL. I.

DESCRIPTION OF THE PLATES.

NATIONAL COATS OF ARMS.

THE UNITED KINGDOM.—The British National Coat of Arms shows the arms of England, Scotland, and Ireland conjoined, or, in heraldic language, "quartered" together on one escutcheon, the arms of England occupying the first and fourth quarters of the shield, those of Scotland the second, and those of Ireland the third. The armorial insignia of England are in the language of heraldry described as "gules, three lions passant gardant in pale or", that is, on a red field three lions in gold (or yellow) arranged vertically and in the attitude of walking past with their faces turned towards the spectator. A lion in this attitude is distinctively known in heraldry as "a lion of England". There were originally only two lions in the royal arms. The three lions were first adopted by Henry II. (about 1152), and have ever since continued to be the insignia of England. They are said to represent, respectively, Normandy, Poitou (or Maine), and Aquitaine. The lion is perhaps the most common of all heraldic emblems. It also figures as the emblem of Scotland, the Scottish arms being heraldically described as "or, a lion rampant, within a double tressure flory-counterflory gules", that is, on a gold (or yellow) ground a lion in red rampant within the special ornamental border in red shown on plate. How old the lion is as an emblem of the Scottish kings is doubtful; it is at least as old as Alexander II. (1214–48). The arms of Ireland are described as "azure, a harp or, stringed argent", that is, a harp of gold with silver strings on a blue ground. The Irish arms are not very ancient, and were first quartered with those of England and Scotland by James I. The garter and its motto (see description of plate DECORATIONS OF HONOUR) surrounds the royal arms of Britain, and below is the royal motto, Dieu et mon droit, "God and my right". The lion and the unicorn serve as "supporters" of the shield, being first adopted as such by James I. Two unicorns were previously supporters of the royal arms of Scotland, hence the adoption of the unicorn.

GERMANY.—The national symbol of Germany is the black eagle of the empire, with red beak, tongue, and claws, and having an imperial crown above its head, but detached. Resting on or surmounting this eagle is the royal Prussian coat of arms—a silver shield containing a similar eagle, with a sceptre in one foot and a mound or orb in the other, and having its wings ornamented with trefoil stalks in gold. The small shield in the centre, divided quarterly into silver and black, is the hereditary escutcheon of the Hohenzollern family, the reigning house of Prussia. Round the shield of Prussia is the chain or collar of the order of the Black Eagle.

RUSSIA.—The chief symbol is the black double-headed eagle, with both heads crowned, and with an imperial crown above, holding a sceptre in one foot and a mound in the other. The shield resting on the eagle contains the arms of Moscow—the figure of St. George and the dragon on a red field. Round the shield is the collar or chain of the order of St. Andrew, the chief Russian order of knighthood (see description of plate DECORATIONS OF HONOUR).

FRANCE.—The figure is that of Liberty, holding in one hand a bundle of rods surrounding a double-headed axe (this emblem being borrowed from the ancient Roman fasces—see Dict.), and resting the other on a rudder. Accompanying the figure are symbols of agriculture, commerce, &c.

AUSTRIA.—The symbol of the Austrian Empire is a black double-headed, triple-crowned eagle, somewhat similar to that of Russia, but in one of its feet it holds a sword as well as a sceptre. The shield resting on its breast is divided vertically into three compartments, the first of which contains the red lion on a gold field of the Habsburg or Hapsburg family—the imperial family of Austria; the second the silver fess (or horizontal band) of Austria; the third the arms of Lorraine, which was an ancient possession of the imperial family.

GREECE.—The arms of Greece are very simple—a plain Greek cross in silver on a blue field. Two wild men or savages serve as supporters. The motto is in Greek, and means "My strength is the love of the people".

UNITED STATES.—The well-known symbol of the United States is the eagle, which is usually represented in its natural form and colours, and not as a mere heraldic monstrosity. In one foot it clutches a sheaf of arrows, in the other an olive branch. On its breast is a shield bearing the stars and stripes. The number of stars, it is said, should correspond with that of the present number of states, the stripes with that of the original number, namely thirteen. Sometimes the stars are omitted. The motto E pluribus unum, "One (formed) out of many", refers to the formation of the one republic out of a number of different states. These armorial insignia appear first about 1791 or 1792.

SPAIN.—In the Spanish coat of arms the arms of Castile and Leon are arranged quarterly, and are surmounted by a shield showing the lilies of the Bourbon family (to which the Spanish royal family belongs) on a blue field. The triple-towered castle represents the kingdom of Castile, the crowned lion the kingdom of Leon. The fruit in the base is intended for a pomegranate, and symbolizes Granada.

PORTUGAL.—The main shield here is the one in white (silver), on which are the five small shields in blue, arranged cross-wise, and each bearing five bezants or coins similarly arranged. Round these is a broad border in red, charged with seven castles in gold.

HUNGARY.—Hungary as a kingdom has a coat of arms for itself. The most noteworthy feature of this coat is the patriarchal cross (as it is called) springing from the crown that rests on the top of a triple hill. The horizontal red divisions on the right half of the shield are said to represent the chief rivers of Hungary. The crown above the shield is that of St. Stephen, the first king of Hungary (997–1038), who received it from the pope. It may be noticed that the small orb and cross on the top of the crown lies over sidewise. This is to commemorate the fact that the actual crown was buried for many years, during which period the socket of the orb became loosened.

TURKEY.—Properly speaking, there is no national Turkish coat of arms. The signature or cipher of the reigning Sultan is often used instead. A well-known symbol is the crescent with a star between the horns, the whole on a green ground. The Turks are said to have used the crescent on their flags as long ago as 1209, when they were still dwelling in Central Asia. This usage has been traced to the worship of the heavenly bodies which prevailed among them previous to their conversion to Mohammedanism.

ROUMANIA.—The first quarter of the shield contains the arms of Wallachia (the crowned eagle with outspread wings), the second those of Moldavia, the third of Krajova, the fourth (the dolphins) of Bessarabia. The small shield in the centre is that of the Hohenzollern family (already seen in the arms of the German Empire), the sovereign of the country being a member of this family. The motto is Nihil sine Deo, —"Nothing without God".

DENMARK.—The arms of Denmark are rather complicated. The chief feature of the main shield, above which are two others, is the silver cross bordered with red of the order of knighthood, the Danebrog, dividing it into four quarters. In the first quarter are the arms of Denmark proper—three crowned lions in blue on a gold field sprinkled with red hearts. In the other quarters are the arms or emblems of Schleswig (which ceased to belong to Denmark only in recent times), Jutland, Sweden, Iceland, the Faroes, and Greenland. The smaller shields have also emblems relating to other divisions of the monarchy or to the history of the royal family.

SWITZERLAND.—The national coat of arms of Switzerland is very simple—a plain silver cross in a red field, the arms of the cross not reaching the edges of the shield (as in the case of the Greek arms). Each of the cantons has also arms of its own, and in the great seal of the country these are shown surrounding the national arms. The motto is, Un pour tous; tous pour un—"One for all; all for one".

SWEDEN AND NORWAY. The arms of the two countries are here combined. The three crowns in the blue field are for Sweden, the red lion below for Gothland. The golden lion holding the axe or halbert with bent handle is for Norway. The oval compartment in the centre bears emblems of the royal Swedish house of Vasa and of the principality of Pontecorvo, Bernadotte, who became King of Sweden in 1818, having been previously Prince of Pontecorvo.

ITALY.—A plain white or silver cross in a red field, originally the arms of the house of Savoy, to which the royal family of Italy belongs.

BELGIUM.—A golden lion in a black field—originally the arms of the duchy of Brabant, Brabant forming a very important portion of the kingdom of Belgium. The motto is L'union fait la force—"Union gives strength".

HOLLAND—THE NETHERLANDS.—A crowned lion in gold on a blue field sprinkled with gold "billets". In one fore-paw the lion holds a sword, in the other a sheaf of arrows. The lion is a badge of the Nassau dynasty, to which the Dutch royal family belongs, but it was also used as that of the old Dutch Republic. The motto is Je maintiendrai—"I will maintain (or support)".

ANATOMY.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF TERMS APPLIED TO THE BONES AND MUSCLES OF THE HUMAN BODY.

THE SKELETON.

THE skeleton, or hard framework which supports the soft parts of the body, defends the viscera, and acts as levers to the muscles, is composed of bones united with one another by joints of various forms. The bones consist of an earthy or mineral part and an animal part. The earthy matter forms about 70 of every 100 parts of the bone, and the animal or organic matter about 30 of every 100, less than one-third. The animal matter is like gelatine; and the earthy consists of phosphate and carbonate of lime, phosphate of magnesia, and chloride of sodium (common salt). The texture varies in different bones, and in different parts of the same bone.

The bones of the body are usually classified as Long or Cylindrical, such as the long bones of the arm or leg; Short or Irregular, such as the small bones of the wrist and sole of the foot; and Flat or Tabular, such as the bones of the skull. The long bones are compact in their middle portion, and cellular or spongy at the extremities, which also have a larger diameter. They have a longitudinal cavity (the medullary canal) throughout their length containing the marrow. The other bones are compact externally, and cellular or cancellated internally. They have no medullary canal, though their substance contains marrow. Bone is completely covered outside by a dense fibrous coating called the periosteum, which is richly supplied with blood, and plays a chief part in the growth of bone. The cavity in a bone is also lined with a similar membrane called endosteum, also rich in blood-vessels.

The bone itself seems so dry and hard as to have no moisture within it, nor any blood supply; but this is not the case, for blood-vessels pass into it from the periosteum through minute openings, and most long bones have besides a special artery, called the nutrient artery, entering them to carry a due supply of nourishment. Bones have not only this large blood supply obtained from the nutrient artery, and from the periosteum covering the outer, and the endosteum lining the inner surface, but they also contain innumerable little cells of living material, which are capable of drawing from the blood the sort of food they require, and thus of maintaining a constant net-work of nourishing channels through the whole bone. The joints or articulations where one bone is united to another are furnished in many cases with plates or pads of cartilage, which afford a smooth, glassy surface for motion. There is also a smooth, delicate membrane which lines all parts of the inside of the joint, except the opposing surfaces of cartilage, and pours out a fluid which moistens the cavity, and so reduces friction and heat; while bundles of delicate wavy fibres bound firmly together, called ligaments, pass from one bone to another, and strongly support the joint, which sometimes they completely surround.

The skeleton of the human body is divided into head, trunk, and limbs, and is made up of more than 200 separate bones in all. The Head includes the part inclosing the brain, called the cranium, and the face; the former containing 8 bones, the latter 14. The trunk consists of the backbone or vertebral column, and the chest or thorax. The Vertebral Column is composed originally of 32 separate pieces, each piece being called a vertebra. In the adult state the separate pieces number only 26, several having become fused together. The Chest or Thorax consists of 12 vertebræ behind, of 24 ribs, 12 on each side, which spring from the vertebræ and arch forwards, and of the breast-bone or sternum, to which by means of cartilages most of the ribs are united in front. The Upper Extremity (arms) is connected with the thorax by means of two bones, the collar-bone or clavicle, and the shoulder-bone or scapula, which together receive the name of the shoulder-girdle. The Lower Extremity (legs), like the Upper, is connected to the trunk by means of a girdle called the pelvis or pelvic girdle.

THE MUSCLES.

While the bones form the framework of the body, the main bulk of the substance which clothes them consists of muscular tissue or what is termed flesh. Muscular tissue does not cover and surround the bones in continuous sheets, but is collected into masses called Muscles, varying in size and length, and arranged in different ways. Muscles are anatomically divided into two varieties, named striped or striated muscle, and unstriped, non-striated, or smooth muscle. Both are the active agents in motion, but the movement caused by striped muscle, for instance the motions of our limbs in walking, in grasping, and so on, which are due to contractions of the muscles of leg or arm, is a movement controlled by our will, while the unstriped or smooth muscle exists in organs also capable of contractions, but contractions quite independent of our will, which go on without our willing, even without our knowing. For this reason the former is also called voluntary muscle, and the latter involuntary muscle. The simplest idea of muscular action is to regard a muscle as stretched between two points, and as capable of drawing these points towards each other in virtue of the property known as contractility. Muscular contraction usually results from nervous action, but muscles will respond to other than this stimulation. Mechanical means will also cause them to contract, an electric current has the same effect, heat also is capable of producing contraction, as well as chemical stimuli. Muscles are connected with bones not directly but through the medium of tendon. This tendon presents the appearance of a white glistening cord, sometimes flat, but often cylindrical, and of considerable thickness. The mass of flesh composing the muscle is called the belly of the muscle. One end is usually attached to a bone, more or less fixed, and is called the origin of the muscle; the other end is attached to the bone meant to be moved by the contraction of the muscle, and is called the insertion of the muscle. There are several hundreds of separate muscles in the human body, the principal of which are mentioned in the list below, the designations being mostly Latin adjectives.

SIDE VIEW OF FULL FIGURE (Fig. 1).

1. Occipito-frontalis—Used to raise the eyebrows, wrinkle the skin of the forehead, and move the scalp backwards and forwards.
2. Temporalis—Helps to elevate the lower jaw.
3. Orbicularis palpebrarum—Closes the eyelids.
4. Masseter—Helps to elevate the lower jaw and move it forwards.
5. Sterno-cleido-mastoideus—A pair of muscles which together bow the head forwards; one acting by itself is able to turn the head, and therefore the chin, to the opposite side.
6. Trapezius—The trapezii muscles acting together draw the head directly backwards; one of them acting alone inclines the head to the corresponding side; the superior part of the trapezius raises the point of the shoulder; this muscle also aids in drawing the scapula backwards and forwards, and in causing it to ascend and descend.
7. Platysma myoides—Assists in depressing the angle of the mouth.
8. Deltoides—Raises the arm, and aids in carrying it backwards and forwards.
9. Biceps flexor cubiti— } Act together in bending the fore-
10. Brachialis anticus— } arm.

11. Triceps extensor cubiti—Antagonist of the two former; when the forearm is bent, the triceps, by drawing in the extremity of the ulna, is able to extend it on the humerus, and thus bring both parts of the limb into a right line.
12. Supinator radii longus—A flexor of the forearm.
13. Extensor muscles of thumb.
14. Extensor muscles of wrist.

22. Tensor vaginæ femoris—Renders the fascia tense, and turns the limb inwards.
23. Vastus externus—Contributes to extend the leg upon the thigh; the extensor muscles of the leg act upon the thigh-bone, and counteract the weight of the body, which tends to bend the knee and other articulations.
24. Biceps flexor cruris—Assists in bending the leg on the thigh, and in turning the limb slightly inwards and outwards.
25. Gastrocnemius—Along with the solæus this muscle forms the calf of the leg; they jointly draw on the heel-bone, lifting it from the ground, and cause the foot to represent an inclined plane.
26. Tibialis anticus—Co-operates with 31 in bending the foot on the leg; acting separately, each gives a slight inclination towards the corresponding side.
27. Extensor communis digitorum—Aids in extending the toes, and in bending the foot upon the leg.

7. Pronator radii teres—Turns the palm of the hand downwards, and aids in bending the forearm on the arm.
8. Supinator radii longus—Acts as antagonist to pronator of hand (7), turning the palm upwards; it is also a flexor of forearm.
9. Flexor carpi radialis—Bends the wrist and becomes a flexor of the forearm.
10. Palmaris longus, and fascia—Bends the hand upon the forearm, and aids in its pronation.
11. Flexor digitorum communis—Bends the fingers towards the palm, acts on the wrist, and assists in the bending of the arm.
12. Flexor carpi ulnaris—Bends the wrist, and becomes a flexor of the forearm.
13. Abductor pollicis manus—Carries the thumb outwards and forwards from the palm.
14. Flexor brevis pollicis—Flexor of first joint of thumb.
15. Palmaris brevis—A small cutaneous muscle connected with the muscles of the little finger.

DESCRIPTION OF THE PLATES.

COLOUR.

COLOUR, as defined in the Dictionary, is that in respect of which bodies have a different appearance to the eye, independently of their form. Putting it another way, colour is a property of light rather than of bodies, and is a sensation rather than an entity, the different colours being due to the different sensations that lights of various rates of vibration give rise to when they fall upon the retina. Light, as is now known, is due to waves or vibrations in the ether that fills all space. The optic nerves are excited by vibrations of the light-bearing ether when the rapidity of the vibrations is not greater than or less than two limits, which perhaps vary slightly with different eyes—just as some ears cannot hear intensely shrill sounds or dull sounds that are perceived by others. Every vibration between these limits is recognized as light; its intensity or brightness is observed; but besides this the eye is differently affected by light of certain special times of vibration, and it is to this variation in the sensation that the term colour is given. Ordinary white light, such as that of the sun, is not simple, but consists of a large number of coloured lights, which, falling upon the eye, together produce the sensation of white light. This was first clearly proved by Sir Isaac Newton, by means of a triangular glass prism. In his experiment a round hole in the shutter of a darkened room let in a beam of sunlight which was received on a prism of glass; after emerging from the prism the round beam was found to have altered in section, now giving as its cross section on a white screen a long band or ribbon with semicircular ends. The beam had also altered in colour, for, instead of being white it exhibited the colours of the rainbow in due order. This band of colours was the solar spectrum as it is called. (See SPECTRUM in Dict.) The colours of the spectrum are usually said to be seven—red, orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo, violet, and these are popularly known as the primary colours. In the spectrum, however, they shade into each other by insensible degrees, and it is impossible to say where one ends and the next begins.

Authorities are now agreed in accepting the doctrine that there are three elements of colour-sensation, or three distinct physiological actions, which by their various combinations produce our various sensations of colour. Each is excitable by light of various wave-lengths lying within a wide range, but has a maximum of excitability for a particular wave-length, and is affected only to a slight degree by light of a wave-length very different from this. One of these colour-sensations is excited in greatest purity by waves corresponding to the green, another by those of the extreme red, and a third by those of the extreme violet in the solar spectrum. Physiologically, therefore, there are considered to be only three primary colours, coloured lights, or colour-sensations, by the proper combination of which all other colour-sensations may be produced. These three colours or kinds of light cannot be resolved into any others, while a yellow ray, for instance, can be resolved into a red and a green, or can be produced by the mingling of red and green light. Scientifically, therefore, the primary colours are red, green, and blue (or violet), and yellow is not a primary colour. In regard to the mixing of pigments, however, it may be still so called, and the three primary colours in this sense are red, yellow, and blue, since a yellow and a blue pigment always produce a green when mixed. White light is not necessarily produced by the combined effect of all the various spectral colours, as the same sensation may be produced by the combined action on the retina of two—yellow and ultramarine blue, for instance. Indeed any one of the elementary colours, from the extreme red of the spectrum to a certain point in the yellowish green, may be combined with another elementary colour on the other side of green in such proportion as to produce a perfect imitation of ordinary white. Two colours (that is, coloured lights) having such a relation are said to be complementary to each other.

A body which reflects (by irregular reflection and not as in a mirror) all the rays of the spectrum in equal proportion will appear of the same colour as the light which falls upon it; that is to say, in ordinary cases, white or gray. But the majority of bodies reflect some rays in larger proportion than others, and are therefore coloured, their colour being that which arises from the mixture of the rays that they reflect. A body reflecting no light would be perfectly black. Practically, white, gray, and black differ only in brightness. A piece of white paper in shadow appears gray, and in a stronger shadow black. A transparent body, seen by transmitted light, is coloured, if it is more transparent to some rays than to others, its colour being that which results from mixing the transmitted rays. No new ingredient is added by transmission, but certain ingredients are more or less stopped out or absorbed. When two pieces of coloured glass are placed one behind the other, the light which has passed through both has undergone a double process of selective absorption, and therefore consists mainly of those rays which are abundantly transmitted by both pieces of glass; or, to speak broadly, the colour which we see in looking through the combination is not the sum of the colours of the two glasses, but their common part. Accordingly, if we combine a piece of ordinary red glass, transmitting light which consists almost entirely of red rays, with a piece of ordinary green glass, which transmits hardly any red, the combination will be almost black.

The subject of the natural colours of bodies is a difficult one, and is not yet fully understood. It is usual to say that the colour of a body is due to the absorption of part of the light that falls upon it, and the reflection of the rest; that is, the light enters the body for a short distance, is reflected internally, and, at the same time, suffers absorption before it reaches the eye. The colour of a pigment, accordingly, is due to the light which remains after internal reflection and absorption. Thus the colour of a mixture of two pigments is not due to a mixture of the lights that would come from the separate pigments. As already mentioned, a mixture of yellow and blue lights produces on the eye the effect of white light, whereas a mixture of a yellow and a blue pigment sends to the eye the colours that are common to both, and therefore has a green tinge. If a circular disc is divided into sectors coloured alternately yellow and blue, and is made to revolve very rapidly, the resultant tint seen has no green in it, but is of a pinkish or purplish tinge.

The coloured plate in this volume, exemplifying the chief colours and tints, is intended for practical purposes and for persons interested in the arts, rather than to illustrate scientific facts connected with light and colour. In it red, yellow, and blue are treated as the primary colours; and it shows how, with pigments having respectively the same colours, the colours of the spectrum and various tints may be obtained. From a mixture of any two of these three primaries we get three chief secondary colours: red and blue, according to the proportion in which they are combined, yield the different hues of purple and violet; red and yellow yield orange; and yellow and blue yield green. The complementary colours here are the opposites of any given colours. Thus, taking the primaries, the complementary colour of blue is orange (=red and yellow); the complementary colour of yellow is purple (=red and blue); and the complementary colour of red is green (=yellow and blue); the complementary colour of any secondary being thus the other primary. Of the tints shown in the plate (which are only a mere fraction of those that might be shown) some, as will be seen, are obtained by a combination of two of the primaries in suitable proportions, while others require the combination of three, among the latter tints being pearl-gray, buff, and citron, for instance.

ARCHÆOLOGY,

ILLUSTRATING THE REMAINS OF THE STONE AND OF THE BRONZE PERIOD.

ARCHÆOLOGY, or the science of antiquities, being of too extended a nature to admit of complete illustration within the limits at our disposal, we have selected our figures exclusively from the department of "Northern Antiquities", as being the most interesting to the inhabitants of the British Islands.

The remains of olden times that have come down to us consist chiefly of tools, implements, and vessels of various kinds, arms and personal ornaments, with cromlechs and barrows—the burying-places of the ancient inhabitants by whom these utensils were used or made.

Battle-fields have supplied numerous swords and other pieces of armour, and the clearing of morasses has often brought to light tools and implements long concealed in their ooze; but without some link to connect them with the people of past ages, relics found in such localities would be of comparatively little historical value. A stone chisel or axe, and a bronze sword found near each other in the same peat-bog, would prove little beyond their own existence; but the same articles found in ancient burying-places, and allied with human remains, shed a wonderful light upon history of far-distant times. While, therefore, numerous sources have contributed to fill the cabinets of collectors with objects of antiquarian interest, the most important have been the places of sepulture, for by their means have archæologists been able to classify the ancient remains into an early, a middle, and a later period, named—from the prevalence of the material employed during them—THE STONE PERIOD. THE BRONZE PERIOD. THE IRON PERIOD.

The remains of these periods, but more especially of the first two, have been very aptly named prehistoric, because they carry us back to an era in the history of the respective countries in which they are found anterior to the existence of written records.

THE STONE PERIOD.

During this period the dead were buried in grave-mounds called barrows or cairns (see fig. of barrows in Dict.). These were made of heaped-up stones and earth covering over and containing in their interior a kind of rude chambers, formed of large stones placed one upon the other, and were often situated on slightly elevated mounds surrounded by a number of upright stones. Barrows are mainly of two kinds, round barrows of comparatively small size, and containing only one chamber; and long barrows, varying in length from 60 to 400 ft., and in breadth from 16 to 40 ft., with a height of about 12 ft., and containing often three chambers. Many of the long barrows are of what is known as the "horned" type, having projecting horn-like extensions at either end. These barrow chambers formed the regular places of interment, in which several bodies, probably of the same family, were deposited. "In examining such sepulchral chambers as have remained undisturbed until the present time, it has been ascertained that they always contained skeletons of one or more bodies, together with arrow-heads, lances, chisels, and axes of flint, implements of bone, ornaments of amber or of bone, and earthen vessels filled with loose earth" (Worsaae). During this period the process of working metals seems to have been quite unknown; for while, as will be seen from our engraving, chisels, wedges, axes, lance and arrow heads, knives, hammers, saws, &c., of stone, chiefly of flint, and of bone and horn, have been found in abundance, yet no metal implements have been discovered in the graves of this distant era. It is presumed, therefore, that the people must then have been in a very primitive condition, and have gained their subsistence chiefly from the chase and from fishing. That they were not unacquainted with navigation on rivers and lakes is rendered evident by the boats of this period which have been discovered. These are as long as 20 to 30 feet, and hollowed out of a single tree by fire and cutting with stone tools, the marks of which still remain to bear witness to their employment. None of the tools then known being sufficiently powerful to enable the natives to fell large trees, it is probable that they accomplished their purpose partly by the aid of their flint tools and partly by the aid of fire. Trees have, indeed, been found buried in peat-bogs, bearing evidence of having been felled in this manner. Looking to the care with which the dead were buried, we may presume that the dwellings of this period were composed of stone, wood, and earth.

The stone axes and hammers, often designated celts, of this period are very interesting implements of various forms. They are either pierced with a hole for the handle or have no such hole, being thus fixed to the shaft in some other manner. While some of them are made of flint, others are of granite, gneiss, porphyry, or other hard stone. They vary greatly in size; and while some have an edge at both ends, thus forming a double axe, others have only one edge or have both ends blunt. Some, again, have the edge in the same direction as the shaft-hole, while others have it at right angles to this direction, thus belonging to the adze type of tool—if, indeed, they are to be called tools and not rather weapons, as many of them at least no doubt were. Some of them exhibit a beautiful finish such as the modern lapidary, with all his tools and appliances, could not surpass. The flint arrow-heads are also exceedingly interesting relics of remote antiquity, especially those of the barbed form, which must have required extraordinary dexterity in their fabrication. They are usually furnished with a stem or tang, no doubt intended to be inserted in the cleft end of the shaft. Various samples of rough hand-made pottery also belong to the stone period, generally vessels with wide mouths, round bottoms, and thick lips, ornamented with various flutings and scorings.

THE BRONZE PERIOD.

This period is characterized by two well-marked features: the dead were generally burned and their relics placed in vessels of clay, and buried not in chambers of massive stones, but in mounds of earth without stone chambers, and with, in general, no large stones on the bottom, with exception of stone cists (see fig. in Dict.), which are easily distinguished from stone chambers. Along with these human remains contained in urns, are found a variety of objects in metal, chiefly bronze, but often gold. "The usual mode of interment appears to have been as follows:—A large pile of wood was erected, on which the body was placed. When the pile was consumed, the small bones which remained were collected, together with some portion of the surrounding ashes, and placed in an earthen vessel, which was deposited in the midst of the consumed pile and surrounded with stones. In this vessel, in addition to the bones and the ashes, were deposited different small articles of bronze, such as pins, knives, pincers, &c., and, together with these, the various weapons and ornaments possessed by the deceased. After this the vessel was carefully closed with its usual cover, or more generally with a flat stone; the whole was then covered with small stones, which were usually placed in a conical heap, over which the usual barrow of earth was erected." (Worsaae.) In many cases the burials of the bronze period are commemorated by a remarkable ring or circle surrounding the areas in which the interments have been made. As the art of working in metals belongs to a more advanced state of knowledge and civilization than the fabrication of stone implements, the bronze period is to be dated later than the stone period, compared with which indeed it is comparatively modern. Similarly, as the art of working in iron is much more difficult than in bronze, the smelting and hammering of the former requiring greater knowledge and skill than the casting of the latter, it would be naturally inferred, if we did not know it to be a fact, that, as the bronze followed the stone period, so it preceded the iron period.

Among the articles found belonging to this period, a selection of which is depicted in our engraving, swords may be specially named, from their very frequent occurrence both in tombs and elsewhere. They are from 2 ft. to 2 ft. 6 in. long, two-edged, and beautifully cast, many specimens found seeming to be fresh from the mould. The hilt in some cases is of wood fastened on with nails, and sometimes of bronze ornamented with gold. Bronze celts are also found belonging to the same period. These are likewise cast, and always hollowed out to receive a wooden handle, with an ear frequently introduced at the side probably to assist in fastening the handle, by means of a thong. Another implement of frequent occurrence, known as a palstave, is from 3 to 9 in. long, and of the shape of a chisel expanded towards the edge. It was fastened at the smaller end to a wooden handle, and probably used as a kind of axe or pickaxe. Many of the moulds in which the articles were cast have also been found. Of the pottery of this period numerous examples remain in the urns or clay vessels so commonly found in connection with burials, as also in various other circumstances. Articles of gold frequently occur during this period, evincing very considerable skill in casting and in ornamenting. The possession and manufacture of these articles, displaying as they do a considerable amount of artistic skill,—together with trumpets, shields, buckles, pins, &c.,—lead us to infer that during this period civilization advanced greatly.

THE IRON PERIOD.

In external appearance, and in some respects in internal structure, the tombs of this period are similar to those of the bronze period; but in one respect they differ in a very marked degree, the dead were buried in them unburned. The difficult art of smelting and working iron having now been practised, the remains are very various, and bring us down to the era of written or engraved records, including those interesting relics called Runic stones, found in various countries of Northern Europe. A peculiar type of prehistoric dwellings belongs to the iron period, and is as old as the bronze period also, if not indeed older. These dwellings are the crannogs, lake or lacustrine dwellings. (See under LACUSTRINE in Dict.) They were structures that, for the security of the occupants, were erected in lakes, at some distance from the shore, a foundation being first prepared by driving in piles and tying them together with cross-beams, or by heaping up logs, brush-wood, stones, clay, gravel, or other materials, so as to provide a firm foundation. These insular abodes or strongholds were reached either by a boat, or by a wooden gangway or stone causeway, in some cases submerged to the depth of several feet.

Though these three periods are sufficiently marked, it must at once be obvious that, after the discovery of the art of mixing copper and tin to make bronze, implements of stone would continue to be partially used for a time; and that, after the discovery of the art of smelting and working iron, tools of bronze would, in like manner, for a time continue to be employed. Thus each period would gradually blend into that which followed, in place of breaking off suddenly or in an abrupt manner. This transition is sufficiently evidenced by implements of stone and of bronze, and implements of bronze and of iron, being often found together in the same tomb.

It would add materially to the interest of archæological research, could it enable us to assign a date to the respective prehistoric periods just enumerated, and state with precision the epochs in the world's history to which they are to be referred. Here, however, the student is encountered by multiform and insuperable difficulties, arising partly from the absence of written records, and partly from the confusion and intermingling necessarily presented by these primitive remains themselves. It is quite obvious that the stone or bronze period of any particular country must belong to an epoch more or less remote according as the nation in question has advanced in civilization and mental culture. Thus, in Great Britain, a country that produces copper and tin, it may naturally be supposed that the bronze period commenced at an earlier date than in Denmark, where these metals are not found. The date at which the iron period began in Britain was probably several centuries before the Christian era. Where the knowledge of smelting iron first arose it would be difficult to say, but that it reached Britain from Gaul is certain. The ancient Gauls are spoken of as having iron swords some centuries before Christ, and when Cæsar invaded Britain he found the metal well known in the country, where by this time it was probably smelted. In Scandinavia the bronze age lasted into the Christian era; while in the Grecian world it appears to have died out some eight or nine centuries earlier.

BIRDS.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF TERMS USED IN ORNITHOLOGY.

BIRDS—Aves—form the second class of the great division of the vertebrate animals, and one of the most distinctly marked groups of the animal kingdom. They are oviparous; have warm blood, and a heart containing four cavities; respire by means of lungs; have four limbs, the anterior pair of which take the form of wings, and are in general intended for flight, while the posterior are intended for walking, perching, or climbing; a body covered with feathers.

The mouth of birds takes the form of a beak, the two jaws or mandibles being hard and horny, and more or less prolonged into a point, while there are no fleshy lips and no teeth. The beak is variously modified in accordance with the habits of the bird and the nature of the food on which it subsists, and furnishes important characters for distinguishing the different groups into which the class is divided. The sense of taste is not keen in birds, their tongue being generally slender, pointed, and more or less horny, though some birds, as the parrots, have it fleshy. Sometimes, as in the woodpeckers, it can be projected to a considerable distance beyond the mandibles.

The alimentary canal of birds is not greatly different from that of mammalia. There are three stomachs or stomachic dilatations: the first is the crop, a considerable pouch attached to the œsophagus or gullet; then the ventriculus succenturiatus, a slight dilatation of the œsophagus, with thick and glandular walls; then immediately after this is the third stomach or gizzard, a strong and muscular cavity. In granivorous birds the crop is large, and serves as a reservoir for the seeds swallowed by them, which are here moistened by a secretion before passing on to the gizzard. In these birds the gizzard is extremely strong, having to perform the onerous task of grinding down the hard substances subjected to its action, a process which is facilitated by the small stones which these birds generally swallow. The ventriculus secretes the gastric juice, and so far represents a real stomach. In birds which live on flesh or fish the gizzard is weaker and less distinct from the ventriculus; while the crop becomes smaller, and in some species completely disappears. The intestine is relatively smaller than in mammalia, and presents fewer circumvolutions. It terminates in an opening called the cloaca, which is also the common termination of the ureters and oviduct. The liver and kidneys are large.

The circulation of the blood in birds is very rapid and vigorous, more so than in mammalia, and their blood is also from 8° to 12° warmer. The lungs are fixed against the ribs, and enveloped in a membrane pierced with large holes, which permit the air to pass into cavities in the breast, the abdomen, and, in some species, even into the interior of the bones. The bird can thus fill with air its lungs and a considerable portion of the volume of its body, and is thus rendered exceedingly light when floating in the atmosphere.

The skin is covered with feathers, which are a kind of hair, and in texture, colour, brilliancy, and general structure, vary infinitely. Feathers may be divided into three kinds—down, smaller feathers, and quills. The down is covered by the other feathers, forming a warm coating close to the skin, and is especially abundant in aquatic birds, and birds inhabiting the colder regions of the globe. Birds moult or renew their feathers twice a year, and in many cases the winter plumage displays a different colouring from the summer plumage. Young birds, too, have sometimes a plumage special to themselves, and this is the case in birds the male and female of which both have the same plumage. Generally the male alone is adorned with bright colours, while the female is arrayed in tints more dull and uniform.

The sense of touch in birds can scarcely be supposed to be acute, and the same has been remarked of the sense of taste. The sense of smell, however, is often very delicate, and that of sight extremely keen, and equally adapted for near and distant objects. A hawk can perceive a small bird at twenty times the distance at which a man could see it. A peculiar feature in the eye of birds is the nictitating membrane, a sort of third translucent eyelid which rests in the inner angle of the eye, but can be drawn over it so as to protect it from a too strong light. Birds have no external ear, with the exception of the nocturnal tribes; these have a large exterior conch in the form of a thin leathery piece of flesh. The internal ear, however, is very large, and the sense of hearing very quick.

Every peculiarity in the external appearance of birds is fitted for the element they inhabit. In addition to the general lightness and firmness of their structure, their anterior limbs form wings or aerial oars, by which they cleave their way through the air with astonishing swiftness. The same bones are found in their anterior limbs as in mammalia, but profoundly modified. (See fig. 43.) The scapula or shoulder-blade is slender and elongated, and the two clavicles or collar-bones are soldered together so as to form one forked bone called the furcula or merry-thought. Two bones, called the coracoid bones, are interposed between the humerus and the sternum, and form strong pillars supporting the wings. In the bones which form the extremity of the wing we recognize the rudiments of a thumb and two fingers (fig. 45), one of which has two phalanges and the other only one. The quill feathers or primaries are attached to the hand, the next largest or secondaries to the forearm, the tertiaries and scapulars are attached to the humerus. The sternum or breast-bone is large and strong, and serves as the point of attachment for the most powerful of the muscles by which the wings are set in action. It is provided with a medial crest, which is most prominent in the birds of most powerful flight, and is altogether absent in the ostrich and cassowary, birds which do not fly.

The bones of the legs consist of the thigh-bone, the tibia, the metatarsal bone, and the toes. The legs and toes vary in length and form, according as they are adapted for perching, running, wading, swimming, &c. When the legs are long the neck must be long to enable birds to lift their food from the ground, though aquatic birds, such as swans, have long necks with short legs. The number of vertebræ varies greatly. The sparrow, which has the fewest, has nine vertebræ in the back and nine in the neck, while in the neck of the swan there are twenty-three.

All birds lay eggs, and almost all hatch them by sitting on them, and keeping them at a uniform warmth. The time required to hatch the eggs varies from twelve days (humming-bird) to forty-five days (swan) or perhaps more. The majority of birds build some kind of nest for the reception of their eggs, though some deposit them on the bare ground. There is a wonderful diversity in the structure of the nests, and many of them are marvels of beauty and dexterity. Some birds excavate nests in the sides of quarries and similar situations, and may be called miners; others, such as the swallow and the flamingo, may be called masons; others, as the woodpeckers, are carpenters; and there are also tailors, weavers, &c.

The gift of song constitutes one of the greatest charms of birds, and many among them merit the title of Nature's musicians. This faculty is possessed by the male birds only, and is chiefly exercised in the spring-time when they are pairing. It depends upon a particular conformation of the windpipe and larynx.

Many birds change their abodes regularly at certain seasons, remaining part of the year in one place and the remainder in another. These migrations, as they are called, are mostly from north to south, or vice versa, according as the birds seek a warmer climate on the approach of winter, or retire northward when the cold season is over. The unfailing regularity with which these aerial voyages are made is one of the most remarkable facts in the history of birds.

Birds are commonly divided into seven orders, as given below, the distinguishing characteristics of which are derived chiefly from the structure of the bill and feet, which vary according to the habits of the bird.

Order I.—RAPTORES—Accipitres. Birds of Prey, as eagles, vultures, hawks, and owls.

Characteristics: Feet adapted for seizing and destroying other animals. Claws sharp, much hooked, and retractile. Hind toe on the same level with the others.

Order II.—INSESSORES—Passeres or Perching Birds. This order is much more numerous than any of the others. It includes all the singing birds, and indeed, excluding the birds of prey, most birds which live habitually among trees.

Characteristics: Feet formed for grasping and perching, claws moderately curved and not retractile. Hind toe on the same level as the rest.

This order is usually divided into four tribes or sub-orders.

Tribe I.—Conirostres (cone-billed). Characteristics: Bill conical, strong, feet formed for perching and walking. Omnivorous.

a Conical bill (Conirostral). b Crest. x Uropygium, rump. z Crissum or under tail-coverts.

Fig. 6.—Head of Cardinal Bird, or Virginian Nightingale.
d Maxilla or upper mandible of the bill, its ridge or keel being called the culmen. e Mandibulum or lower mandible, the lower ridge being the gonys. f Crest.

Fig. 7.—Head of Rice-bunting or Java Sparrow (Oryzornis oryzivora).
a Gena, the cheek. b Culmen. c Gonys.

Fig. 8.—Head of Bristle-necked Thrush (Trichophorus), native of Malay Archipelago.
a Vibrissæ or rictal bristles. b Nucha or nape of the neck. c Nuchal bristles.

Fig. 9.—Foot of Skylark (Alauda arvensis). Insessorial foot, formed for walking on grass, and for assisting the bird in jerking upward till it can take wing.

Tribe II.—Dentirostres (tooth-billed). Characteristics: Bill shorter and rather compressed, with a distinct tooth-like notch. Insectivorous.

Fig. 10.—Head of Red-backed Shrike (Lanius collurio).
a Maxilla. b Mandibulum. c Vibrissæ. g Frons, front, forehead. h Vertex, top of the head. i Sinciput, back of the head. o Eye-streak, entire, i.e. on both sides of the eye.

Fig. 11.—Drongo Shrike (Edolius Malabaricus), native of Malabar. a Tail spatulate.

Tribe III.—Tenuirostres (slender-billed). Characteristics: Bill long, tongue extensile, formed for sucking.

Fig. 12.—Gould's Humming-bird (Trochilus Gouldii), native of South America.
a Tenuirostral bill, curved. b Crest. c Neck-tufts or lappets. d d Wings, falcate or sword-shaped.

Tribe IV.—Fissirostres (cleft-billed). Characteristics: Bill broad at the base, gape very wide.

Fig. 13.—Head of Swallow (Hirundo).
Fissirostral Bill. a Rictus or gape.

Fig. 14.—Foot of Kingfisher (Alcedo ispida). Syndactyl foot.
a First and second toes, connected as far as the first joint. b Second and third, as far as the last joint.

Order III.—SCANSORES—Zygodactyli. Climbing Birds, as the parrots, woodpeckers, cuckoos, toucans, &c.

Characteristics: Feet formed for climbing, two of the toes directed forward and two backward; powers of flight not in general great; bill variously shaped.

Fig. 15.—Foot of Woodpecker. Scansorial foot.

Fig. 16.—Ivory-billed Woodpecker (Picus principalis), native of North America.
a Bill, cuneated or wedge-shaped. b Crest, movable. c Feet, scansorial. d Tail, stiff, serving as a support. e Tail feather, to show the stiff projecting stem.

Fig. 17.—Alexandrine Parroquet (Palæornis Alexandri), native of East Indies.
Feet, scansorial. Bill large and hooked, used in climbing.

Order IV.—RASORES—Gallinæ. Domestic Fowls, Pheasants, &c.

Characteristics: Legs large and strong. Feet with the hind toe situated above the heel, suited for scratching. Bill short, thick, and arched above.

Fig. 18.—Wild Turkey (Meleagris gallopavo), native of North America.
a Caruncle or wattle on the bill. b Papillæ on the neck. c Fasciculus of rigid hairs. d Scales. e Spurs.

Fig. 19.—Head of Impeyan Pheasant (Lophophorus refulgens), native of East Indies.
a Lanceolated or pedunculated crest.

Order V.—CURSORES—Struthionidæ. Running Birds, as the ostrich, emu, cassowary, &c.

Characteristics: Wings rudimentary and quite useless for flight; legs long and strong; hind toe wanting or merely rudimentary; breast-bone without a ridge or keel.

Fig. 20.—Head of Ostrich (Struthio camelus). a Frons. b Vertex. c Sinciput. d Mentum. n Nucha.

Fig. 21.—Foot of Ostrich (Struthio camelus). A cursorial foot, suitable for swift motion over dry and sandy surfaces. Only two toes, the outer with a broad, blunt claw.
a Tarsus, thick and long.

Fig. 22.—Head of Cassowary (Casuarius galeatus), native of Malayan Archipelago. Helmeted or galeated, having a bony crest.

Fig. 23.—The Apteryx or Kiwi-kiwi of New Zealand (Apteryx australis). Wings apparently absent, being quite rudimentary.

Order VI.—GRALLATORES—Grallæ. Waders, as the cranes, herons, snipes, sandpipers, &c.

Characteristics: Legs long, bare of feathers from above the knee; toes often half-webbed. Bill in general long and slender.

Fig. 24.—Sacred Ibis (Ibis religiosa), native of Egypt.
a Curved or incurved bill.
b Mentum or chin.
c Gula or throat.
d Jugulum, lower part of throat.
e Guttur, throat or fore part of neck, including c and d.
f Pectus, the breast.
g Espigastrium, upper abdomen.
h Venter, lower abdomen.
i Abdomen, including g and h.
k Crissum, under tail-coverts.
l Dorsum, the back.
m Auchenium, lower neck behind.
n Nucha, the nape.
o Cervix, hind neck, including m and n.
p Knee.
q Secondaries with elongated barbs.

Fig. 25.—Lapwing (Vanellus cristatus).
a Crest.

Fig. 26.—Foot of Phalarope (Phalaropus hyperboreus).
a Toes, scalloped.

Fig. 27.—Head of Crane (Grus).
a Bill, straight, compressed. b Pendant crest.

Fig. 28.—Head of Avocet (Recurvirostra Avocetta).
a Recurved bill.

Fig. 29.—Head of Horned Screamer (Palamedea cornuta), native of Guiana.
a Crest. b Horn.

Fig. 30.—Head of Boat-bill (Cancroma cochlearia), native of Brazil.
a Boat-shaped bill. b Crest.

Order VII.—NATATORES—Palmipedes. Swimmers: web-footed birds, as ducks, geese, gulls, &c.

Characteristics: Feet formed for swimming, in general webbed, that is the toes connected by a membrane. Hind toe elevated above the plane of the others.

Fig. 31.—Head of Common Swan (Cygnus olor).
a Cere, black, naked, and prominent. b Nail of the bill.

Fig. 32.—Head of Common Duck (Anas boschas).
a Bill, broad and depressed. b Nail of the bill.

Fig. 33.—Head of Goose (Anser).
a Bill, compressed. b Nail.

Fig. 34.—Head of Scissor-bill (Rhynchops nigra).
a Upper mandible, truncated and shorter than the lower.

Fig. 35.—Head of Cormorant (Phalacrocorax carbo).
a Semi-raptorial bill. b Crest.

Fig. 36.—Penguin (Aptenodytes patagonica), native of the South Pacific.
a Mentum or chin. b Gula or throat. c Pectus or breast. d Rudimentary wings, covered with scale-like feathers. e Feet, webbed.

Fig. 37.—Summer Duck, Anas (Dendronessa) sponsa, native of North America.

Fig. 38.—Puffin (Fratercula arctica), native of Britain.
a Bill, compressed and furrowed.

Fig. 39.—Foot of Grebe (Podiceps). Lobed foot.
a Toes, with a broad membrane on each side.

Fig. 40.—The Pelican (Pelicanus onocrotalus).
a Pouch used for holding fish, capable when dilated of holding two gallons of water.

Fig. 41.—Foot of Skua Gull (Lestris cataractes), a native of Shetland. A predaceous bird, with hooked claws.
a Hallux a mere tubercle.

Fig. 42.—Head of Flamingo (Phœnicopterus ignipalliatus). Edges of both mandibles furnished with fine, close, tooth-like laminæ, which strain out of the water the small animals on which it feeds.

Fig. 43.—Skeleton of Bird (Pigeon).

a The head, caput.
b Cervical vertebræ.
c Dorsal vertebræ, ankylosed.
